MATT We are heartily sorry, Captain, for your misfortune. But 'tis what we must all come to.

MACHEATH Peachum and Lockit, you know, are infamous scoundrels. Their lives are as much in your power as yours are in theirs. Remember your dying friend! Tis my last request. Rring those villains to the gallows before you, and I am satisfied.

MATT We'll do't.

JAILER Miss Polly and Miss Lucy entreat a word with you.

MACHEATH Gentlemen, adieu.

8. Kisses.

SCENE 15

LUCY, MACHEATH, POLLY

MACHEATH Lucy, my dear Polly, whatsoever hath passed between us is now at an end. If you are fond of marrying again, the best advice I can give you, is to ship yourselves off for the West Indies,<sup>9</sup> where you'll have a fair chance of getting a husband apiece; or by good luck, two or three, as you like best.

POLLY How can I support this sight!

LUCY There is nothing moves one so much as a great man in distress.

AIR 68. All you that must take a leap

LUCY Would I might he hanged!

POLLY And I woidd so too!

LUCY To he hanged with you.

POLLY My dear, with you.

MACHEATH O leave me to thought! I fear! I doubt!

I tremble! I droop! See, my courage is out.

[Turns up the empty bottle.]

POLLY No token of love?

MACHEATH See, my courage is out.

[Turns up the empty pot.]

LUCY No token of love?

POLLY Adieu.

LUCY Farewell.

MACHEATH But hark! I hear the toll of the bell.'

CHORUS Tol de rol lol, etc.

JAILER Four women more, Captain, with a child apiece! See, here they come.
[Enter women and children.]

MACHEATH What—four wives more! This is too much. Here—tell the sheriff's officers I am ready. [Exit MACHEATH guarded.]

SCENE 16

To them, enter PLAYER and BEGGAR

PLAYER But, honest friend, I hope you don't intend that Macheath shall be really executed.

BEGGAR Most certainly, sir. To make the piece perfect, I was for doing strict poetical justice. Macheath is to be hanged; and for the other personages of the drama, the audience must have supposed they were all either hanged or transported.

PLAYER Why then, friend, this is a downright deep tragedy. The catastrophe is manifestly wrong, for an opera must end happily.

BEGGAR Your objection, sir, is very just, and is easily removed. For you must allow that in this kind of drama 'tis no matter how absurdly things are brought about. So—you rabble there—run and cry a reprieve. Let the prisoner be brought back to his wives in triumph.

9. In the sequel to The Beggar's Opera, Polly does find a husband in the West Indies, where fortunes could be made.

1. Rung five minutes before the condemned were taken to Tyburn.

PLAYER All this we must do, to comply with the taste of the town.

BEGGAR Through the whole piece you may observe such a similitude of manners in high and low life, that it is difficult to determine whether (in the fashionable vices) the fine gentlemen imitate the gentlemen of the road, or the gentlemen of the road the fine gentlemen. Had the play remained as I at first intended, it would have carried a most excellent moral. 'Twould have shown that the lower sort of people have their vices in a degree as well as the rich, and that they are punished for them.<sup>2</sup>

SCENE 17

To them, MACHEATH with rabble, etc.

MACHEATH SO, it seems, I am not left to my choice, but must have a wife at last. Look ye, my dears, we will have no controversy now. Let us give this day to mirth, and I am sure she who thinks herself my wife will testify her joy by a dance.

ALL Come, a dance, a dance.

MACHEATH Ladies, I hope you will give me leave to present a partner to each of you. And (if I may without offense) for this time, I take Polly for mine. [To POLLY.] And for life, you slut, for we were really married. As for the rest—But at present keep your own secret.

A DANCE

AIR 69. Lumps of pudding

*Thus I stand like the Turk, with his doxies around;
From all sides their glances his passion confound;
For black, brown, and fair, his inconstancy burns,
And the different beauties subdue him by turns;
Each calls forth her charms, to provoke his desires;
Though willing to all, with hut one he retires.
But think of this maxim, and put off your sorrow,
The wretch of today may be happy tomorrow.*

CHORUS But think of this maxim, etc.

FINIS

2. Unlike the rich.

WILLIAM HOGARTH

1697-1764

William Hogarth was a Londoner born and bred; the life of the city, both high and low, fills all his work. His early life was hard. When his father, a writer and teacher, failed in business, the family was confined to the area of the Fleet, the debtor's prison.

Hogarth never forgot "the cruel treatment" of his father by booksellers, and he resolved to make his living without relying on dealers; he would always be aggressively independent. Apprenticed as an engraver, he trained himself to sketch scenes quickly or catch them in memory. He also learned to paint, studying with the Serjeant Painter to the King, Sir James Thornhill, whose daughter he married (late in life Hogarth himself would become Serjeant Painter). Gradually he won a reputation for portraits and conversation pieces—group portraits in which members of a family or assembly interact in a social situation. But his popular fame was forged by sets of pictures that told a story: A Harlot's Progress (1731-32), A Rake's Progress (1734-35), and Marriage A-la-Mode (1743-45). First Hogarth painted these Modern Moral Subjects (as he called them), then prints were made and sold in large editions. He also found new ways to market and protect his work; a copyright bill to ban cheap imitations of prints was known as "Hogarth's Act." Despite this success, however, his ambition to redefine British standards of art led to frustration. The high regard and high prices for continental old masters were too well entrenched to be undermined. Hogarth did not get prestigious commissions, and his Analysis of Beauty (1753), an effort to fix "the fluctuating ideas of taste" by appealing to practical observations, not academic rules, was poorly received. Political and aesthetic controversies embittered his final years.

Writers have always loved Hogarth's satiric art, and many have claimed him as one of their own. Swift, Fielding, and Sterne associated their work with his; Horace Walpole considered him more "a writer of comedy with a pencil" than a painter; Charles Lamb compared him to Shakespeare; and William Hazlitt included him among the great English comic writers. This emphasis may slight Hogarth's importance in the history of art. His attempts to found a British school that looked at life and nature directly, not through a haze of ideas or reverence for the past, and to give pleasure to common people, not only to critics and connoisseurs, opened the eyes of many artists to come. But Hogarth is also a great storyteller, someone to read. Like novels and plays, his pictures have plots and morals; they ask us not only to look but also to think. Yet looking and thinking are always intertwined. The mind delights in riddles, according to Hogarth; and as he revised his work he stuffed in more and more clues, like a mystery writer. A feast of interpretation draws the reader in. So many expressive details crowd the pictures, so many keys to character and meaning, that viewers often become obsessed with figuring them out. Even inanimate objects can speak; playwrights rely on words, as Walpole pointed out, but "it was reserved to Hogarth to write a scene of furniture."

The furniture is particularly eloquent in Marriage A-la-Mode; note, for example, the fallen chairs in Plates 2 and 6. Hogarth took special pains with this series. The audience at which he aimed, as well as the subject matter, belonged to high society; and the art too is highly refined. A sinuous line weaves through each picture, leading the reader on, and each piece of bric-a-brac carries a message of lavish excess. Yet the story itself is brutally straightforward. A disastrous forced marriage stands at the center: a rich but miserly merchant buys the worthless son of an aristocrat for his restless daughter, and with nothing in common the couple destroy one another. The crisis of values that Hogarth depicts was bringing about radical changes in English life. In the tension between a fading aristocracy, both morally and financially bankrupt, and an upwardly mobile middle class, greedy for power but culturally insecure, the marriage reflects a society that has lost all sense of right and wrong. The artist plays no favorites. The aristocratic Squanderfields are not only vain, effete, and dissipated but also lacking in taste; the wan mythological paintings on their walls are just the sort of pretentious, overpriced art that Hogarth hates. But the vulgar Dutch art on the merchant's walls (in Plate 6) seems even worse, and his daughter falls for every extravagant, spurious fashion (in Plate 4). Nor do the parasites who live off these easy marks offer any hope. Lawyer and doctor, bawd and servant pave the road to ruin. Hogarth's satire warns against the spreading corruption of modern times, when self-interest eats into marriage and old values die. Look hard, he tells the public. These objects make up the world we live in. We might become these people.

Many commentaries have been written on Hogarth's pictures. The notes printed here were supplied by the editors of this volume.

Marriage A-la-Mode

Plate 1. The Marriage Contract. Lord Squanderfield points to the family tree, going back to William the Conquerer, that his son will bring to the marriage. Coronets are blazed all over the room, from the top of the canopy at the upper left to the side of the prostrate dog on the lower right. The earl, though hobbled by gout, is proud. But he has run out of money: construction has stopped on the Palladian mansion seen through the window. Sitting across from him, a squinting merchant grasps the marriage settlement. Some of the coins and banknotes he has placed on the table have been taken up by a scrawny usurer, who hands the earl a mortgage in return. At the right the betrothed sit back to back, uncaring as the dogs chained to each other below. The vacuous viscount pinches snuff and gazes at himself in a mirror, which ominously reflects the image of lawyer Silvertongue, who sharpens his pen as he bends unctuously over the bride-to-be. Pouting, she twirls her wedding ring in a handkerchief. Disasters from mythology cover the walls. A bombastic portrait of the earl as Jupiter, astride a cannon, dominates the room; and in a candle sconce on the right Medusa glowers over the scene.

Plate 2. After the Marriage. By now the couple are used to ignoring each other. The morning after a spree, the rumpled, exhausted viscount slouches in a chair. His broken sword has dropped on the carpet, and a lapdog sniffs at a woman's cap in his pocket—souvenirs of the night. Lolling and stretching in an unladylike pose, his wife too is half asleep. She has spent the night home but not alone. Hoyle on Whist lies before her, cards are scattered on the floor, and the overturned chair, book of music, and violin cases suggest that some player may have departed in haste. A steward carries away a sheaf of bills—only one paid—and the household ledger; a Methodist (Regeneration is in his pocket), he petitions heaven to look down on these heathens. Oriental idols decorate the mantel over the fireplace, surmounted by a broken-nosed Roman bust that frowns like the steward and a painting of Cupid playing the bagpipes. On the left, amid the shrubbery of a rococo clock, a cat leers over fish and a Buddha smiles. In the next room, a dozing sen-ant fails to notice that a candle has set fire to a chair. Next to a row of saints, a curtain does not quite cover a bawdy painting from which a naked foot peeps.

Plate 3. The Scene with the Quack. The husband has come to this chamber of medical horrors in search of a cure. The pillbox he holds toward the quack has not done its job, and he raises his cane as if with a playful threat. Evidently the little girl who stands between his legs is infected. She dabs a sore on her lip, and her ageless face may hint that she is not as young and pure as she looks. Her cap resembles the cap in Plate 2; she is the husband's mistress. Perhaps the beauty spot on his neck also covers a sore. The bowlegged Monsieur de la Pillule comfortably wipes his glasses; he has seen all this before. Between the two men an angry woman, fortified by a massive hoop skirt, opens a knife. She may be the wife of the quack, defending her man, or else a bawd who resents the charge that her girls are damaged goods. Medical oddities and monstrosities clutter the room, along with portents of death. The viscount's cane points to a cabinet where a wigged head looks at a skeleton that seems to be groping a cadaver; the tripod above evokes a gallows tree. At the far left, in front of a laboratory door, are two of the doctor's inventions: machines for setting bones and uncorking bottles. Their similarity to instruments of torture hints at how useful the doctor's assistance will be.

Plate 4. The Countess's Levee. In her bedchamber at rising (levee; French), the countess receives some guests and puts on a show. Her husband is now earl (note the coronets), and they have a child (note the rattle on her chair). While a hairdresser curls her locks, she hangs on the words of Silvertongue, who makes himself at home (note his portrait on the upper right wall). Tonight they will be going to a masquerade ball, like the one on the screen he gestures toward; his left hand holds the tickets. At the far right a puffy, bedizened castrato sings, accompanied by a flute. His audience includes a self-absorbed dandy in curl-papers; a man who appreciatively smirks and opens his hand, from which a fan dangles; a snoring husband, holding his riding-crop like a baton; and his enraptured wife, who leans forward as if about to swoon. Unobserved by the others, a black servant, bearing a cup of chocolate, smiles in amazement at these precious airs. At the lower left another black servant, a boy in a turban, grins at gewgaws purchased at an auction. His finger points both to Actaeon's horns, the sign of a cuckold, and to the couple as they arrange their tryst. Wall paintings illustrate unnatural sex: Lot's seduction by his daughters, Jupiter embracing Io, and the rape of Ganymede.

Plate 5. The Death of the Earl. The melodramatic tableau at the center, as the earl totters toward death and the countess kneels to beg forgiveness, imitates paintings of Christ descending from the cross while Man' Magdalen mourns. But the surroundings are sordid. At a house of ill repute, the Turk's Head Bagnio, the countess and Silvertongue have been surprised in bed. The earl has broken in (key and socket on the floor) and drawn his sword, and the lawyer has run him through. As the horrified owner and constable enter, under a watchman's lantern, the killer, still in his nightshirt, flees through a window. A fire, outside the picture on the lower right, casts lurid light on the victim; the shadow of the tongs encircles the murder weapon. Costumed as a nun and friar, the lovers have come from a masquerade, and their discarded masks and clothes show they were in haste. Pills (presumably mercury, prescribed for venereal disease) have spilled from an overturned table on the right, beside an advertisement for the bagnio, a corset, and a bundle of firewood. The portrait of a streetwalker, a squirrel perched on her hand, leers over the countess; on the wall behind the earl an uplifted blade is about to sever a child, in the Judgment of Solomon. At the top left St. Luke, the patron of artists, inscribes these transgressions.

Plate 6. The Death of the Countess. "Counsellor Silvertongues Last Dying Speech," a paper on the floor announces, and a bottle of laudanum has dropped beside it. News of her lover's execution has driven the countess to poison herself. Slumped in a chair, she is already dead; on the far right a doctor steals away. Her father calmly slides the ring from her finger. This is his house; a window with cobwebs and broken panes opens on London Bridge, in the heart of the City. No luxury here. The furnishings are sparse, the floor is bare, and the dining table holds only one egg and a few leftovers, including a pathetic boar's head from which a starving hound is tearing scraps. The art is equally cheap: a pissing boy, a jumbled still life, a pipe set alight by the glowing nose of a drunk. At the center, beneath a coatrack, a stout apothecary (stomach pump and julep in his pocket) points toward the empty bottle in reproof and pokes the servant who brought it—an idiot wearing a coat many sizes too large, the merchant's hand-me-down. The service staff is completed by a withered old woman who holds out the countess's little child for one last hug and kiss. But the mark on the child's cheek and the brace on its leg imply that disease has passed to the next generation. This noble family will have no heir.

SAMUEL JOHNSON

1709-1784

Samuel Johnson was famous as a talker in his own time, and his conversation (preserved by James Boswell and others) has been famous ever since. But his wisdom survives above all in his writings: a few superb poems; the grave Rambler essays, which established his reputation as a stylist and a moralist; the lessons about life in Rasselas and the Lives of the Poets; and literary criticism that ranks among the best in English. The virtues of the talk and the writings are the same. They come hot from a mind well stored with knowledge, searingly honest, humane, and quick to seize the unexpected but appropriate image of truth. Johnson's wit is timeless, for it deals with the great facts of human experience, with hope and happiness and loss and duty and the fear of death. Whatever topic he addresses, whatever the form in which he writes, he holds to one commanding purpose: to see life as it is.

Two examples must suffice here. When Anna Williams wondered why a man should make a beast of himself through drunkenness, Johnson answered that "he who makes a beast of himself gets rid of the pain of being a man." In this reply Williams's tired metaphor is so charged with an awareness of the dark aspects of human life that it comes almost unbearably alive. Such moments characterize Johnson's writings as well. For instance, in reviewing the book of a fatuous would-be philosopher who blandly explained away the pains of poverty by declaring that a kindly providence compensates the poor by making them more hopeful, more healthy, more easily pleased, and less sensitive than the rich, Johnson retorted: "The poor indeed are insensible of many little vexations which sometimes embitter the possessions and pollute the enjoyments of the rich. They are not pained by casual incivility, or mortified by the mutilation of a compliment; but this happiness is like that of a malefactor who ceases to feel the cords that bind him when the pincers are tearing his flesh."

Johnson had himself known the pains of poverty. During his boyhood and youth in Lichfield, his father's bookshop and other businesses plunged into debt, so that he was forced to leave Oxford before he had taken a degree. An early marriage to a well-to-do widow, Elizabeth ("Tetty") Porter, more than twenty years older than he, enabled him to open a school. But the school failed, and he moved to London to make his way as a writer. The years between 1737, when he first arrived there with his pupil David Garrick (who later became the leading actor of his generation), and 1755, when the publication of the Dictionary established his reputation, were often difficult. He supported himself at first as best he could by doing hack work for the Gentleman's Magazine, but gradually his own original writings began to attract attention.

In 1747 Johnson published the Plan of his Dictionary, and he spent the the next seven years compiling it—although he had expected to finish it in three. When in 1748 Dr. Adams, a friend from Oxford days, questioned his ability to carry out such a work alone so fast and reminded him that the Dictionary of the French Academy had needed forty academicians working for forty years, Johnson replied with humorous jingoism: "Sir, thus it is. This is the proportion. Let me see; forty times forty is sixteen hundred. As three to sixteen hundred, so is the proportion of an Englishman to a Frenchman."

Johnson's achievement in compiling the Dictionary seems even greater when we realize that he was writing some of his best essays and poems during the same period. Although the booksellers who published the Dictionary paid him what was then the large sum of £1575, it was not enough to enable him to support his household, buy materials, and pay the wages of the six assistants whom he employed year by year until the task was accomplished. He therefore had to earn more money by writing. In 1749, his early tragedy Irene (pronounced I-re-ne) was produced at long last by his old friend Garrick, by then the manager of Drury Lane. The play was not a success, although Johnson made some profit from it. In the same year appeared his finest poem, "The Vanity of Human Wishes." With the Rambler (1750—52) and the Idler (1758—60), two series of periodical essays, Johnson found a devoted audience, but his pleasure was tempered by the death of his wife in 1752. He never remarried.

Boswell said of the Rambler essays that "in no writings whatever can be found more bark and steel [i.e., quinine and iron] for the mind." Moral strength and health; the importance of applying reason to experience; the test of virtue by what we do, not what we say or "feel"; faith in God: these are the centers to which Johnson's moral writings always return. What Johnson uniquely offers us is the quality of his understanding of the human condition, based on wide reading but always ultimately referred to his own passionate and often anguished experience. Such understanding had to be fought for again and again.

Johnson is thought of as the great generalizer, but what gives his generalizations strength is that they are rooted in the particulars of his self-knowledge. He had constantly to fight against what he called "filling the mind" with illusions to avoid the call of duty, his own black melancholy, and the realities of life. The portrait (largely a self-portrait) of Sober in Idler 31 is revealing: he occupies his idle hours with crafts and hobbies and has now taken up chemistry—he "sits and counts the drops as they come from his retort, and forgets that, whilst a drop is falling, a moment flies away."

His theme of themes is expressed in the title "The Vanity of Human Wishes": the dangerous but all-pervasive power of wishful thinking, the feverish intrusion of desires and hopes that distort reality and lead to false expectations. Almost all of Johnson's major writings—verse satire, moral essay, or the prose fable Rasselas (1759)—express this theme. In Rasselas it is called "the hunger of imagination, which preys upon life," picturing things as one would like them to be, not as they are. The travelers who are the fable's protagonists pursue some formula for happiness; they reflect our naive hope, against the lessons of experience, that one choice of life will make us happy forever.

Johnson also developed a style of his own: balanced, extended sentences, phrases, or clauses moving to carefully controlled rhythms, in language that is characteristically general, often Latinate, and frequently polysyllabic. This style is far from Swift's simplicity or Addison's neatness, but it never becomes obscure or turgid, for even a very complex sentence reveals—as it should—the structure of the thought, and the learned words are always precisely used. While reading early scientists to collect words for the Dictionary, Johnson developed a new vocabulary: for example, ohund, exuberate, fugacity, and frigorific. But he used many of these strange words in conversation as well as in his writings, often with a peculiarly Johnsonian felicity, describing the operations of the mind with a scientific precision.

After Johnson received his pension in 1762, he no longer had to write for a living, and because he held that "no man but a blockhead" ever wrote for any other reason, he produced as little as he decently could during the last twenty years of his life. His edition of Shakespeare, long delayed, was published in 1765, with a fine preface and fascinating notes. His last important work is the Lives of the Poets, which came out in two parts in 1779 and 1781. These biographical and critical prefaces were commissioned by a group of booksellers who had joined together to publish a large collection of the English poets and who wished to give their venture the prestige that Johnson would lend it. The poets to be included (except for four insisted on by Johnson) were selected by the booksellers according to current fashions. Therefore the collection begins with Abraham Cowley and John Milton and ends with Thomas Gray, and it omits such standard poets as Chaucer, Spenser, Sidney, Donne, and Marvell.

In the Lives of the Poets and in the earlier Life of Richard Savage (1744), Johnson did much to advance the art of biography in England. Biography had long been associated with panegyrics or scandalous memoirs; and therefore, Johnson's insistence on truth, even about the subject's defects, and on concrete, often minute, details was a new departure. "The biographical part of literature is what I love most," Johnson said, for he found every biography useful in revealing the human nature that all of us share. His insistence on truth in biography (and knowing that Boswell intended to write his life, he insisted that he should write it truthfully) was owing to his conviction that only a truthful work can be trusted to help us with the business of living.

The ideal poet, according to Johnson, has a genius for making the things we see every day seem new. The same might be said of Johnson himself as a critic. (For additional works by Johnson, go to Norton Literature Online.) Johnson is our great champion, in criticism, of common sense and the common reader. Without denying the right of the poet to flights of imagination, he also insists that poems must make sense, please readers, and help us not only understand the world but cope with it. Johnson holds poems to the truth, as he sees it: the principles of nature, logic, religion, and morality. Not even Shakespeare can be excused when "he sacrifices virtue to convenience" and "seems to write without any moral purpose." Yet Johnson is no worshiper of authority or mere "correctness." As a critic he is always the empiricist, testing theory by practice. His determination to judge literature by its truth to life, not by abstract rules, is perfectly illustrated by his treatment of the doctrine of the three unities in the Preface to Shakespeare. Johnson is never afraid to state the obvious, whether the lack of human interest in Paradise Lost or Shakespeare's temptation by puns. But at its best, as in the praise of Milton or Shakespeare, his criticism engages some of the deepest questions about literature: why it endures, and how it helps us endure.

The Vanity of Human Wishes This poem is an imitation of Juvenal's Satire 10. Although it closely follows the order and the ideas of the Latin poem, it remains a very personal work, for Johnson has used the Roman Stoic's satire as a means of expressing his own sense of the tragic and comic in human life. He has tried to reproduce in English verse the qualities he thought especially Juvenalian: stateliness, pointed sentences, and declamatory grandeur. The poem is difficult because of the extreme compactness of the style: every line is forced to convey the greatest possible amount of meaning. Johnson believed that "great thoughts are always general," but he certainly did not intend that the general should fade into the abstract: observe, for example, how he makes personified nouns concrete, active, and dramatic by using them as subjects of active and dramatic verbs: "Hate dogs their flight, and Insult mocks their end" (line 78). But the difficulty of the poem is also related to its theme, the difficulty of seeing anything clearly on this earth. In a world of blindness and illusion, human beings must struggle to find a point of view that will not deceive them, and a happiness that can last.

The Vanity of Human Wishes

In Imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal

Let Observation, with extensive view,
 Survey mankind, from China to Peru;
 Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
 And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
 5 Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate
 O'erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
 Where wavering man, betrayed by venturous Pride
 To tread the drear}' paths without a guide,
 As treacherous phantoms in the mist delude,
 10 Shuns fancied ills, or chases airy good.
 How rarely Reason guides the stubborn choice,
 Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice;

- How nations sink, by darling schemes oppressed,
 When Vengeance listens to the fool's request.
- 15 Fate wings with every wish the afflictive dart,
 Each gift of nature, and each grace of art;
 With fatal heat impetuous courage glows,
 With fatal sweetness elocution flows,
 Impeachment stops the speaker's powerful breath,
- 20 And restless fire precipitates on death.
 But scarce observed, the knowing and the bold
 Fall in the general massacre of gold;
 Wide-wasting pest! that rages unconfined,
 And crowds with crimes the records of mankind;
- 25 For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws,
 For gold the hireling judge distorts the laws;
 Wealth heaped on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys,
 The dangers gather as the treasures rise.
 Let History tell where rival kings command,
- 30 And dubious title<sup>0</sup> shakes the madded land, claim of right
 When statutes glean the refuse of the sword,
 How much more safe the vassal than the lord;
 Low skulks the hind<sup>0</sup> beneath the rage of power, peasant
 And leaves the wealthy traitor in the Tower,<sup>1</sup>
- 35 Untouched his cottage, and his slumbers sound,
 Though Confiscation's vultures hover round.
 The needy traveler, serene and gay,
 Walks the wild heath, and sings his toil away.
 Does envy seize thee? crush the upbraiding joy,
- 40 Increase his riches and his peace destroy;
 New fears in dire vicissitude invade,
 The rustling brake<sup>0</sup> alarms, and quivering shade, thicket
 Nor light nor darkness bring his pain relief,
 One shows the plunder, and one hides the thief.
- 45 Yet still one general cry the sides assails,
 And gain and grandeur load the tainted gales;
 Few know the toiling statesman's fear or care,
 The insidious rival and the gaping heir.
 Once more, Democritus,<sup>2</sup> arise on earth,
- 50 With cheerful wisdom and instructive mirth,
 See motley life in modern trappings dressed,
 And feed with varied fools the eternal jest:
 Thou who couldst laugh where Want enchained Caprice,
 Toil crushed Conceit, and man was of a piece;
- 55 Where Wealth unloved without a mourner died;
 And scarce a sycophant was fed by Pride;
 Where ne'er was known the form of mock debate,
 Or seen a new-made mayor's unwieldy state;<sup>3</sup>
 Where change of favorites made no change of laws,
- 60 And senates heard before they judged a cause;
 How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish tribe,

1. I.e., the Tower of London, which served as a prison. Johnson first wrote "bonny traitor," recalling the Jacobite uprising of 1745 and the execution of four of its Scot leaders.

2. A Greek philosopher of the late 5th century B.C.E., remembered as the "laughing philosopher" because men's follies only moved him to mirth.

3. Pomp. Mayors organized costly processions.

Dart the quick taunt, and edge the piercing gibe?
 Attentive truth and nature to descry,
 And pierce each scene with philosophic eye.
 65 To thee were solemn toys or empty show
 The robes of pleasure and the veils of woe:
 All aid the farce, and all thy mirth maintain,
 Whose joys are causeless, or whose griefs are vain.
 Such was the scorn that filled the sage's mind,
 70 Renewed at every glance on human kind;
 How just that scorn ere yet thy voice declare,
 Search ever)' state, and canvass every prayer.
 Unnumbered suppliants crowd Preferment's gate,
 Athirst for wealth, and burning to be great;
 75 Delusive Fortune hears the incessant call,
 They mount, they shine, evaporate,<sup>4</sup> and fall.
 On every stage the foes of peace attend,
 Hate dogs their flight, and Insult mocks their end.
 Love ends with hope, the sinking statesman's door so Pours in the morning worshiper no more;<sup>5</sup>
 For growing names the weekly scribbler lies,
 To growing wealth the dedicator flies;
 From every room descends the painted face,
 That hung the bright palladium<sup>6</sup> of the place;
 85 And smoked in kitchens, or in auctions sold,
 To better features yields the frame of gold;
 For now no more we trace in every line
 Heroic worth, benevolence divine:
 The form distorted justifies the fall,
 90 And Detestation rids the indignant wall.
 But will not Britain hear the last appeal,
 Sign her foes' doom, or guard her favorites' zeal?
 Through Freedom's sons no more remonstrance rings,
 Degrading nobles and controlling kings;
 95 Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats,
 And ask no questions but the price of votes;
 With weekly libels and septennial ale,<sup>7</sup>
 Their wish is full to riot and to rail.
 In full-blown dignity, see Wolsey<sup>8</sup> stand,
 100 Law in his voice, and fortune in his hand:
 To him the church, the realm, their powers consign,
 Through him the rays of regal bounty shine;
 Turned by his nod the stream of honor flows,
 His smile alone security bestows:
 105 Still to new heights his restless wishes tower,
 Claim leads to claim, and power advances power;

4. Disperse in vapors, like fireworks.

5. Statesmen gave interviews and received friends and petitioners at levees, or morning receptions.

6. An image of Pallas Athena, that fell from heaven and was preserved at Troy. Not until it was stolen by Diomedes could the city fall to the Greeks.

7. Ministers and even the king freely bought support by bribing members of Parliament, who in turn won elections by buying votes. "Weekly libels": politically motivated lampoons published in the weekly newspapers. "Septennial ale": the ale given away by candidates at parliamentary elections, held at least every seven years.

8. Thomas Cardinal Wolsey (ca. 1475-1530), lord chancellor and favorite of Henry VIII. Shakespeare dramatized his fall in Henry VIII.

Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
 And rights submitted, left him none to seize.
 At length his sovereign frowns—the train of state no Mark the keen glance, and watch the sign to hate.
 Where'er he turns, he meets a stranger's eye,
 His suppliants scorn him, and his followers fly;
 At once is lost the pride of awful state,
 The golden canopy, the glittering plate,
 115 The regal palace, the luxurious board,
 The liveried army, and the menial lord.
 With age, with cares, with maladies oppressed,
 He seeks the refuge of monastic rest.
 Grief aids disease, remembered folly stings,
 120 And his last sighs reproach the faith of kings.
     Speak thou, whose thoughts at humble peace repine,
 Shall Wolsey's wealth, with Wolsey's end be thine?
 Or liv'st thou now, with safer pride content,
 The wisest justice on the banks of Trent?
 125 For why did Wolsey, near the steeps of fate,
 On weak foundations raise the enormous weight?
 Why but to sink beneath misfortune's blow,
 With louder ruin to the gulfs below?
     What gave great Villiers<sup>9</sup> to the assassin's knife,
 130 And fixed disease on Harley's closing life?
 What murdered Wentworth, and what exiled Hyde,
 By kings protected, and to kings allied?
 What but their wish indulged in courts to shine,
 And power too great to keep or to resign?
 135 When first the college rolls receive his name,
 The young enthusiast quits his ease for fame;
 Through all his veins the fever of renown
 Burns from the strong contagion of the gown:<sup>1</sup>
 O'er Bodley's dome his future labors spread, 140 And Bacon's<sup>2</sup> mansion trembles o'er his head.
 Are these thy views? proceed, illustrious youth,
 And Virtue guard thee to the throne of Truth!
 Yet should thy soul indulge the generous heat,
 Till captive Science<sup>3</sup> yields her last retreat; knowledge
 145 Should Reason guide thee with her brightest ray,
 And pour on misty Doubt resistless day;
 Should no false kindness lure to loose delight,
 Nor praise relax, nor difficulty fright;
 Should tempting Novelty thy cell refrain,
 150 And Sloth effuse her opiate fumes in vain;
 Should Beauty blunt on fops her fatal dart,

9. George Villiers, first Duke of Buckingham, favorite of James I and Charles I, was assassinated in 1628. Mentioned in the following lines: Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford, chancellor of the exchequer and later lord treasurer under Queen Anne (1710–14), impeached and imprisoned by the Whigs in 1715. Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, intimate and adviser of Charles I, impeached by the Long Parliament and executed in 1641. Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon ("to kings allied" because his daughter married James, duke of York), lord chancellor under Charles II (impeached in 1667, he fled to the Continent).

1. Academic robe: here associated with the poisoned shirt that tormented Hercules.

2. Roger Bacon (ca. 1214–1294), scientist and philosopher, taught at Oxford, where his study, according to tradition, would collapse if a man greater than he should appear at Oxford. "Bodley's dome": the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

Nor claim the triumph of a lettered heart;
 Should no disease thy torpid veins invade,
 Nor Melancholy's phantoms haunt thy shade;
 Yet hope not life from grief or danger free,
 Nor think the doom of man reversed for thee:
 Deign on the passing world to turn thine eyes,
 And pause a while from letters, to be wise;
 There mark what ills the scholar's life assail,
 Toil, envy, want, the patron,<sup>3</sup> and the jail.
 See nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
 To buried merit raise the tardy bust.
 If dreams yet flatter, once again attend,
 Hear Lydiat's life, and Galileo's<sup>4</sup> end.

Nor deem, when Learning her last prize bestows,
 The glittering eminence exempt from foes;
 See when the vulgar 'scapes, despised or awed,
 Rebellion's vengeful talons seize on Laud.<sup>5</sup>
 From meaner minds, though smaller fines content,
 The plundered palace or sequestered rent;<sup>6</sup>
 Marked out by dangerous parts<sup>0</sup> he meets the shock, accomplishments
 And fatal Learning leads him to the block:
 Around his tomb let Art and Genius weep,
 But hear his death, ye blockheads, hear and sleep.

The festal blazes, the triumphal show,
 The ravished standard, and the captive foe,
 The senate's thanks, the gazette's pompous tale,
 With force resistless o'er the brave prevail.
 Such bribes the rapid Greek<sup>0</sup> o'er Asia whirled, Alexander the Great
 For such the steady Romans shook the world;
 For such in distant lands the Britons shine,
 And stain with blood the Danube or the Rhine;
 This power has praise that virtue scarce can warm,
 Till fame supplies the universal charm.
 Yet Reason frowns on War's unequal game,
 Where wasted nations raise a single name,
 And mortgaged states their grandsires' wreaths regret
 From age to age in everlasting debt;
 Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey
 To rust on medals, or on stones decay.

On what foundation stands the warrior's pride?
 How just his hopes, let Swedish Charles<sup>7</sup> decide;
 A frame of adamant, a soul of fire,
 No dangers fright him, and no labors tire;
 O'er love, o'er fear, extends his wide domain,
 Unconquered lord of pleasure and of pain;

4. Famous astronomer (1564—1642) who was imprisoned as a heretic by the Inquisition in 1633; he died blind. Thomas Lydiat (1572-1646), Oxford scholar, died impoverished because of his Royalist sympathies.

5. Appointed archbishop of Canterbury by Charles I, William Laud followed rigorously High Church policies and was executed by order of the Long Parliament in 1645.

6. During the Commonwealth, the estates of many Royalists were pillaged and their incomes confiscated ("sequestered") by the state.

7. Charles XII of Sweden (1682-1718). Defeated by the Russians at Pultowa (1709), he escaped to Turkey and tried to form an alliance against Russia with the sultan. Returning to Sweden, he attacked Norway and was killed in the attack on Fredrikshald.

No joys to him pacific scepters yield,
 War sounds the trump, he rushes to the field;
 Behold surrounding kings their powers combine,
 200 And one capitulate, and one resign;<sup>8</sup>
 Peace courts his hand, but spreads her charms in vain;
 "Think nothing gained," he cries, "till naught remain,
 On Moscow's walls till Gothic standards fly,
 And all be mine beneath the polar sky."
 205 The march begins in military state,
 And nations on his eye suspended wait;
 Stern Famine guards the solitary coast,
 And Winter barricades the realms of Frost;
 He comes, nor want nor cold his course delay—
 210 Hide, blushing Glory, hide Pultowa's day:
 The vanquished hero leaves his broken bands,
 And shows his miseries in distant lands;
 Condemned a needy supplicant to wait,
 While ladies interpose, and slaves debate.
 215 But did not Chance at length her error mend?
 Did no subverted empire mark his end?
 Did rival monarchs give the fatal wound?
 Or hostile millions press him to the ground?
 His fall was destined to a barren strand,
 220 A petty fortress, and a dubious hand;<sup>9</sup>
 He left the name at which the world grew pale,
 To point a moral, or adorn a tale.
 All times their scenes of pompous woes afford,
 From Persia's tyrant to Bavaria's lord.<sup>1</sup>
 225 In gay hostility, and barbarous pride,
 With half mankind embattled at his side,
 Great Xerxes comes to seize the certain prey,
 And starves exhausted regions in his way;
 Attendant Flattery counts his myriads o'er,
 230 Till counted myriads soothe his pride no more;
 Fresh praise is tried till madness fires his mind,
 The waves he lashes, and enchains the wind;<sup>2</sup>
 New powers are claimed, new powers are still bestowed,
 Till rude resistance lops the spreading god;
 235 The daring Greeks deride the martial show,
 And heap their valleys with the gaudy foe;
 The insulted sea with humbler thoughts he gains,
 A single skiff to speed his flight remains;
 The encumbered oar scarce leaves the dreaded coast

 The bold Bavarian, in a luckless hour,
 Tries the dread summits of Caesarean power,
 With unexpected legions bursts away,

8. Frederick IV of Denmark capitulated to Charles in 1700. Augustus II of Poland resigned his throne to Charles in 1704.

9. It was disputed whether Charles was shot by the enemy or by his own aide-de-camp.

1. The Elector Charles Albert caused the War of the Austrian Succession (1740—48) when he contested the crown of the empire with Maria Theresa ("Fair Austria" in line 245). "Persia's tyrant": Xerxes invaded Greece and was totally defeated in the sea battle off Salamis, 480 B.C.E.

2. When storms destroyed Xerxes' boats, he commanded his men to punish the wind and sea.

And sees defenseless realms receive his sway;
 245 Short sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful charms,
 The queen, the beauty, sets the world in arms;
 From hill to hill the beacon's rousing blaze
 Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise;
 The fierce Croatian, and the wild Hussar,<sup>3</sup>
 250 With all the sons of ravage crowd the war;
 The baffled prince in honor's flattering bloom
 Of hasty greatness finds the fatal doom,
 His foes' derision, and his subjects' blame,
 And steals to death from anguish and from shame.
 255 Enlarge my life with multitude of days!
 In health, in sickness, thus the suppliant prays;
 Hides from himself his state, and shuns to know,
 That life protracted is protracted woe.
 Time hovers o'er, impatient to destroy,
 260 And shuts up all the passages of joy;
 In vain their gifts the bounteous seasons pour,
 The fruit autumnal, and the vernal flower;
 With listless eyes the dotard views the store,
 He dews, and wonders that they please no more;
 265 Now pall the tasteless meats, and joyless wines,
 And Luxury with sighs her slave resigns.
 Approach, ye minstrels, try the soothing strain,
 Diffuse the tuneful lenitives of pain:<sup>o</sup> painkillers
 No sounds, alas! would touch the impervious ear, 270 Though dancing mountains witnessed Orpheus<sup>4</sup> near;
 Nor lute nor lyre his feeble powers attend,
 Nor sweeter music of a virtuous friend,
 But everlasting dictates crowd his tongue,
 Perversely grave, or positively wrong.
 275 The still returning tale, and lingering jest,
 Perplex the fawning niece and pampered guest,
 While growing hopes scarce awe the gathering sneer,
 And scarce a legacy can bribe to hear;
 The watchful guests still hint the last offense,
 280 The daughter's petulance, the son's expense, increase
 Improve<sup>o</sup> his heady rage with treacherous skill,
 And mold his passions till they make his will.
 Unnumbered maladies his joints invade,
 Lay siege to life and press the dire blockade;
 285 But unextinguished avarice still remains,
 And dreaded losses aggravate his pains;
 He turns, with anxious heart and crippled hands,
 His bonds of debt, and mortgages of lands;
 Or views his coffers with suspicious eyes,
 290 Unlocks his gold, and counts it till he dies.
 But grant, the virtues of a temperate prime Bless with an age exempt from scorn or crime;
 An age that melts with unperceived decay,

 Whose night congratulating Conscience cheers;
 The general favorite as the general friend:
 Such age there is, and who shall wish its end?
 Yet even on this her load Misfortune flings,
 300 To press the weary minutes' flagging wings;
 New sorrow rises as the day returns,
 A sister sickens, or a daughter mourns.
 Now kindred Merit fills the sable bier,
 Now lacerated Friendship claims a tear;
 305 Year chases year, decay pursues decay,
 Still drops some joy from withering life away;
 New forms arise, and different views engage,
 Superfluous lags the veteran<sup>5</sup> on the stage,
 Till pitying Nature signs the last release,
 310 And bids afflicted Worth retire to peace.
 But few there are whom hours like these await,
 Who set unclouded in the gulfs of Fate.
 From Lydia's monarch<sup>6</sup> should the search descend,
 By Solon cautioned to regard his end, 315 In life's last scene what prodigies surprise,
 Fears of the brave, and follies of the wise!
 From Marlborough's eyes the streams of dotage flow,
 And Swift<sup>7</sup> expires a driveler and a show.
 The teeming mother, anxious for her race,<sup>0</sup>
 320 Begs for each birth the fortune of a face:
 Yet Vane could tell what ills from beauty spring;
 And Sedley<sup>8</sup> cursed the form that pleased a king.
 Ye nymphs of rosy lips and radiant eyes,
 Whom Pleasure keeps too busy to be wise,
 325 Whom Joys with soft varieties invite,
 By day the frolic, and the dance by night;
 Who frown with vanity, who smile with art,
 And ask the latest fashion of the heart;
 What care, what rules your heedless charms shall save,
 330 Each nymph your rival, and each youth your slave?
 Against your fame with Fondness Hate combines,
 The rival batters, and the lover mines.<sup>9</sup>
 With distant voice neglected Virtue calls,
 Less heard and less, the faint remonstrance falls;
 335 Tired with contempt, she quits the slippery reign,
 And Pride and Prudence take her seat in vain.

 But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice.
 Safe in his power, whose eyes discern afar
 The secret ambush of a specious prayer.
 355 Implore his aid, in his decisions rest,
 Secure, whate'er he gives, he gives the best.
 Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires,
 And strong devotion to the skies aspires,
 Pour forth thy fervors for a healthful mind,

 For love, which scarce collective man can fill;<sup>1</sup>
 For patience sovereign o'er transmuted ill;
 For faith, that panting for a happier seat,
 Counts death kind Nature's signal of retreat:

 These goods he grants, who grants the power to gain;
 With these celestial Wisdom calms the mind,
 And makes the happiness she does not find.

On the Death of Dr. Robert Levet<sup>1</sup>

Condemned to Hope's delusive mine,
 As on we toil from day to day,
 By sudden blasts, or slow decline,
 Our social comforts drop away.
 5 Well tried through many a varying year,
 See Levet to the grave descend;
 Officious,<sup>2</sup> innocent, sincere,
 Of every friendless name the friend.
 Yet still he fills Affection's eye,
 10 Obscurely wise, and coarsely kind;

1. Which humankind as a whole can hardly overtask.

1. An unlicensed physician who lived in Johnson's house for many years and who died in 1782. His practice was among the very poor. Boswell wrote:

"He was of a strange grotesque appearance, stiff and formal in his manner, and seldom said a word while any company was present."

2. "Kind, doing good offices" (Johnson's Dictionary).

Nor, lettered Arrogance, deny
Thy praise to merit unrefined.

When fainting Nature called for aid,
And hovering Death prepared the blow,
15 His vigorous remedy displayed
The power of art without the show.

In Misery's darkest caverns known,
His useful care was ever nigh,
Where hopeless Anguish poured his groan,
20 And lonely Want retired to die.

No summons mocked by chill delay,
No petty gain disdained by pride,
The modest wants of every day
The toil of every day supplied.

25 His virtues walked their narrow round,
Nor made a pause, nor left a void;
And sure the Eternal Master found
The single talent well employed.<sup>3</sup>

The busy day, the peaceful night,
30 Unfelt, uncounted, glided by;
His frame was firm, his powers were bright,
Though now his eightieth year was nigh.

Then with no throbbing fiery pain,
No cold gradations of decay,
35 Death broke at once the vital chain,
And freed his soul the nearest way.

Rambler No. 5<sup>1</sup>

[ON SPRING]

TUESDAY, April 3, 1750

Et nunc omnis ager, nunc omnis parturit arbos, Nunc frondent silvae, nunc formosissimus annus.
VIRGIL, Eclogues 3.5.56

Now ev'ry field, now ev'n' tree is green;
Now genial nature's fairest face is seen.

ELPHINSTON

3. In the parable of the talents (Matthew 25.14-30), Jesus suggests that salvation will be granted to those who make good use of their abilities, however small.

1. The Rambler, almost wholly written by Johnson himself, appeared every Tuesday and Saturday from March 20, 1750, to March '14, 1752—year's in which Johnson was writing the Dictionary. It is a successor of the Tatler and the Spectator, but it is much more serious in tone than the earlier periodicals. Johnson's reputation as a moralist and a stylist was established by these essays; because of them Boswell first conceived the ambition to seek Johnson's acquaintance.

Every man is sufficiently discontented with some circumstances of his present state, to suffer his imagination to range more or less in quest of future happiness, and to fix upon some point of time, in which, by the removal of the inconvenience which now perplexes him, or acquisition of the advantage which he at present wants, he shall find the condition of his life very much improved.

When this time, which is too often expected with great impatience, at last arrives, it generally comes without the blessing for which it was desired; but we solace ourselves with some new prospect, and press forward again with equal eagerness.

It is lucky for a man, in whom this temper prevails, when he turns his hopes upon things wholly out of his own power; since he forbears then to precipitate<sup>2</sup> his affairs, for the sake of the great event that is to complete his felicity, and waits for the blissful hour, with less neglect of the measures necessary to be taken in the mean time.

I have long known a person of this temper, who indulged his dream of happiness with less hurt to himself than such chimerical wishes commonly produce, and adjusted his scheme with such address, that his hopes were in full bloom three parts of the year, and in the other part never wholly blasted. Many, perhaps, would be desirous of learning by what means he procured to himself such a cheap and lasting satisfaction. It was gained by a constant practice of referring the removal of all his uneasiness to the coming of the next spring; if his health was impaired, the spring would restore it; if what he wanted was at a high price, it would fall in value in the spring.

The spring, indeed, did often come without any of these effects, but he was always certain that the next would be more propitious; nor was ever convinced that the present spring would fail him before the middle of summer; for he always talked of the spring as coming till it was past, and when it was once past, everyone agreed with him that it was coming.

By long converse with this man, I am, perhaps, brought to feel immoderate pleasure in the contemplation of this delightful season; but I have the satisfaction of finding many, whom it can be no shame to resemble, infected with the same enthusiasm; for there is, I believe, scarce any poet of eminence, who has not left some testimony of his fondness for the flowers, the zephyrs, and the warblers of the spring. Nor has the most luxuriant imagination been able to describe the serenity and happiness of the golden age, otherwise than by giving a perpetual spring, as the highest reward of uncorrupted innocence.

There is, indeed, something inexpressibly pleasing, in the annual renovation of the world, and the new display of the treasures of nature. The cold and darkness of winter, with the naked deformity of every object on which we turn our eyes, make us rejoice at the succeeding season, as well for what we have escaped, as for what we may enjoy; and every budding flower, which a warm situation brings early to our view, is considered by us as a messenger to notify the approach of more joyous days.

The spring affords to a mind, so free from the disturbance of cares or passions as to be vacant<sup>3</sup> to calm amusements, almost every thing that our present state makes us capable of enjoying. The variegated verdure of the fields and woods, the succession of grateful odors, the voice of pleasure pouring out its notes on every side, with the gladness apparently conceived by every animal,

2. "To hurry blindly or rashly" (Johnson's Dictionary).

3. "At leisure" (Johnson's Dictionary).

from the growth of his food, and the clemency of the weather, throw over the whole earth an air of gaiety, significantly expressed by the smile of nature.

Yet there are men to whom these scenes are able to give no delight, and who hurry away from all the varieties of rural beauty, to lose their hours, and divert their thoughts by cards, or assemblies, a tavern dinner, or the prattle of the day.

It may be laid down as a position which will seldom deceive, that when a man cannot bear his own company there is something wrong. He must fly from himself, either because he feels a tediousness in life from the equipoise of an empty mind, which, having no tendency to one motion more than another but as it is impelled by some external power, must always have recourse to foreign objects; or he must be afraid of the intrusion of some unpleasing ideas, and, perhaps, is struggling to escape from the remembrance of a loss, the fear of a calamity, or some other thought of greater horror.

Those whom sorrow incapacitates to enjoy the pleasures of contemplation, may properly apply to such diversions, provided they are innocent, as lay strong hold on the attention; and those, whom fear of any future affliction chains down to misery, must endeavor to obviate the danger.

My considerations shall, on this occasion, be turned on such as are burthensome to themselves merely because they want subjects for reflection, and to whom the volume of nature is thrown open, without affording them pleasure or instruction, because they never learned to read the characters.

A French author has advanced this seeming paradox, that very few men know how to take a walk; and, indeed, it is true, that few know how to take a walk with a prospect of any other pleasure, than the same company would have afforded them at home.

There are animals that borrow their color from the neighboring body, and, consequently, vary their hue as they happen to change their place. In like manner it ought to be the endeavor of every man to derive his reflections from the objects about him; for it is to no purpose that he alters his position, if his attention continues fixed to the same point. The mind should be kept open to the access of every new idea, and so far disengaged from the predominance of particular thoughts, as easily to accommodate itself to occasional entertainment.

A man that has formed this habit of turning every new object to his entertainment, finds in the productions of nature an inexhaustible stock of materials upon which he can employ himself, without any temptations to envy or malevolence; faults, perhaps, seldom totally avoided by those, whose judgment is much exercised upon the works of art. He has always a certain prospect of discovering new reasons for adoring the sovereign author of the universe, and probable hopes of making some discovery of benefit to others, or of profit to himself. There is no doubt but many vegetables and animals have qualities that might be of great use, to the knowledge of which there is not required much force of penetration, or fatigue of study, but only frequent experiments, and close attention. What is said by the chemists of their darling mercury, is, perhaps, true of everybody through the whole creation, that if a thousand lives should be spent upon it, all its properties would not be found out.

Mankind must necessarily be diversified by various tastes, since life affords and requires such multiplicity of employments, and a nation of naturalists<sup>4</sup> is neither to be hoped, or desired; but it is surely not improper to point out a fresh amusement to those who languish in health, and repine in plenty, for want of some source of diversion that may be less easily exhausted, and to inform the multitudes of both sexes, who are burthened with every new day, that there are many shows which they have not seen.

He that enlarges his curiosity after the works of nature, demonstrably multiplies the inlets to happiness; and, therefore, the younger part of my readers, to whom I dedicate this vernal speculation, must excuse me for calling upon them, -to make use at once of the spring of the year, and the spring of life; to acquire, while their minds may be yet impressed with new images, a love of innocent pleasures, and an ardor for useful knowledge; and to remember, that a blighted spring makes a barren year, and that the vernal flowers, however beautiful and gay, are only intended by nature as preparatives to autumnal fruits.

[ON IDLENESS]

SATURDAY, November 18, 1758

Many moralists have remarked, that Pride has of all human vices the widest dominion, appears in the greatest multiplicity of forms, and lies hid under the greatest variety of disguises; of disguises, which, like the moon's veil of brightness, are both its luster and its shade,<sup>2</sup> and betray it to others, though they hide it from ourselves.

It is not my intention to degrade Pride from this pre-eminence of mischief, yet I know not whether Idleness may not maintain a very doubtful and obstinate competition.

There are some that profess Idleness in its full dignity, who call themselves the Idle, as Busiris in the play "calls himself the Proud";<sup>3</sup> who boast that they do nothing, and thank their stars that they have nothing to do; who sleep every night till they can sleep no longer, and rise only that exercise may enable them to sleep again; who prolong the reign of darkness by double curtains, and never see the sun but to "tell him how they hate his beams";<sup>4</sup> whose whole labor is to vary the postures of indulgence, and whose day differs from their night but as a couch or chair differs from a bed.

These are the true and open votaries of Idleness, for whom she weaves the garlands of poppies, and into whose cup she pours the waters of oblivion; who exist in a state of unruffled stupidity, forgetting and forgotten; who have long ceased to live, and at whose death the survivors can only say, that they have ceased to breathe.

But Idleness predominates in many lives where it is not suspected; for being a vice which terminates in itself, it may be enjoyed without injury to others; and is therefore not watched like Fraud, which endangers property, or like Pride, which naturally seeks its gratifications in another's inferiority. Idleness is a silent and peaceful quality, that neither raises envy by ostentation, nor hatred by opposition; and therefore nobody is busy to censure or detect it.

As Pride sometimes is hid under humility, Idleness is often covered by turbulence and hurry. He that neglects his known duty and real employment, naturally endeavors to crowd his mind with something that may bar out the remembrance of his own folly, and does any thing but what he ought to do with eager diligence, that he may keep himself in his own favor.

Some are always in a state of preparation, occupied in previous measures, forming plans, accumulating materials, and providing for the main affair. These are certainly under the secret power of Idleness. Nothing is to be expected from the workman whose tools are forever to be sought. I was once told by a great master, that no man ever excelled in painting, who was eminently curious about pencils and colors.

There are others to whom Idleness dictates another expedient, by which life may be passed unprofitably away without the tediousness of many vacant hours. The art is, to fill the day with petty business, to have always something in hand which may raise curiosity, but not solicitude, and keep the mind in a state of action, but not of labor.

This art has for many years been practiced by my old friend Sober, with wonderful success. Sober is a man of strong desires and quick imagination, so exactly balanced by the love of ease, that they can seldom stimulate him to any difficult undertaking; they have, however, so much power, that they will not suffer him to lie quite at rest, and though they do not make him sufficiently useful to others, they make him at least weary of himself.

Mr. Sober's chief pleasure is conversation; there is no end of his talk or his attention; to speak or to hear is equally pleasing; for he still fancies that he is teaching or learning something, and is free for the time from his own reproaches.

But there is one time at night when he must go home, that his friends may sleep; and another time in the morning, when all the world agrees to shut out interruption. These are the moments of which poor Sober trembles at the thought. But the misery of these tiresome intervals, he has many means of alleviating. He has persuaded himself that the manual arts are undeservedly overlooked; he has observed in many trades the effects of close thought, and just ratiocination. From speculation he proceeded to practice, and supplied himself with the tools of a carpenter, with which he mended his coalbox very successfully, and which he still continues to employ, as he finds occasion.

He has attempted at other times the crafts of the shoemaker, tinman, plumber, and potter; in all these arts he has failed, and resolves to qualify himself for them by better information. But his daily amusement is chemistry. He has a small furnace, which he employs in distillation, and which has long been the solace of his life. He draws oils and waters, and essences and spirits, which he knows to be of no use; sits and counts the drops as they come from his retort, and forgets that, whilst a drop is falling, a moment flies away.

Poor Sober!<sup>5</sup> I have often teased him with reproof, and he has often promised reformation; for no man is so much open to conviction as the Idler, but there is none on whom it operates so little. What will be the effect of this paper I know not; perhaps he will read it and laugh, and light the fire in his furnace; but my hope is that he will quit his trifles, and betake himself to rational and useful diligence.

Rasselas Johnson wrote Rasselas in January 1759 during the evenings of one week, a remarkable instance of his ability to write rapidly and brilliantly under the pressure of necessity. His mother lay dying in Lichfield. Her son, famous for his Dictionary, was nonetheless oppressed by poverty and in great need of ready money with which to make her last days comfortable, pay her funeral expenses, and settle her small debts. He was paid £100 for the first edition of Rasselas, but not in time to attend her deathbed or her funeral.

Rasselas is a philosophical fable cast in the popular form of an Oriental tale, a type of fiction that owed its popularity to the vogue of the Arabian Nights, first translated into English in the early eighteenth century. Because the work is a fable, we should not approach it as a novel: psychologically credible characters and a series of intricately involved actions that lead to a necessary resolution and conclusion are not to be found in Rasselas. Instead we are meant to reflect on the ideas and to savor the melancholy resonance and intelligence of the stately prose that expresses them. Johnson arranges the incidents of the fable to test a variety of possible solutions to a problem: What choice of life will bring us happiness? (The Choice of Life was his working title for the book.) Many ways of life are examined in turn, and each is found wanting. Johnson does not pretend to have solved the problem. Rather, he locates the sources of discontent in a basic principle of human nature: the "hunger of imagination which preys incessantly upon life" (chapter 32) and which lures us to "listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope" (chapter 1). The tale is a gentle satire on one of the perennial topics of satirists: the folly of all of us who stubbornly cling to our illusions despite the evidence of experience. Rasselas is not all darkness and gloom, for Johnson's theme invites comic as well as tragic treatment, and some of the episodes evoke that laughter of the mind that is the effect of high comedy. In its main theme, however—the folly of cherishing the dream of ever attaining unalloyed happiness in a world that can never wholly satisfy our desires—and in many of the sayings of its characters, especially of the sage Imlac, Rasselas expresses some of Johnson's own deepest convictions.

The History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia

Chapter 1. Description of a Palace in a Valley

Ye who listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope; who expect that age will perform the promises of youth, and that the deficiencies of the present day will be supplied by the morrow—attend to the history of Rasselas, prince of Abyssinia.

Rasselas was the fourth son of the mighty emperor in whose dominions the Father of Waters<sup>1</sup> begins his course; whose bounty pours down the streams of plenty, and scatters over half the world the harvests of Egypt.

According to the custom which has descended from age to age among the monarchs of the torrid zone, Rasselas was confined in a private palace, with the other sons and daughters of Abyssinian royalty, till the order of succession should call him to the throne.

The place which the wisdom or policy of antiquity had destined for the residence of the Abyssinian princes was a spacious valley<sup>2</sup> in the kingdom of Amhara, surrounded on every side by mountains, of which the summits overhang the middle part. The only passage by which it could be entered was a cavern that passed under a rock, of which it has long been disputed whether it was the work of nature or of human industry. The outlet of the cavern was concealed by a thick wood, and the mouth which opened into the valley was closed with gates of iron, forged by the artificers of ancient days, so massy that no man could, without the help of engines, open or shut them.

From the mountains on every side rivulets descended that filled all the valley with verdure and fertility, and formed a lake in the middle, inhabited by fish of every species, and frequented by every fowl whom nature has taught to dip the wing in water. This lake discharged its superfluities by a stream, which entered a dark cleft of the mountain on the northern side, and fell with dreadful noise from precipice to precipice till it was heard no more.

The sides of the mountains were covered with trees, the banks of the brooks were diversified with flowers; every blast<sup>3</sup> shook spices from the rocks, and every month dropped fruits upon the ground. All animals that bite the grass, or browse the shrub, whether wild or tame, wandered in this extensive circuit, secured from beasts of prey by the mountains which confined them. On one part were flocks and herds feeding in the pastures, on another all the beasts of chase frisking in the lawns; the sprightly kid was bounding on the rocks, the subtle monkey frolicking in the trees, and the solemn elephant reposing in the shade. All the diversities of the world were brought together, the blessings of nature were collected, and its evils extracted and excluded.

The valley, wide and fruitful, supplied its inhabitants with the necessaries of life, and all delights and superfluities were added at the annual visit which the emperor paid his children, when the iron gate was opened to the sound of music, and during eight days everyone that resided in the valley was required to propose whatever might contribute to make seclusion pleasant, to fill up the vacancies of attention, and lessen the tediousness of time. Every desire was immediately granted. All the artificers of pleasure were called to gladden the festivity; the musicians exerted the power of harmony, and the dancers showed their activity before the princes, in hope that they should pass their lives in this blissful captivity, to which those only were admitted whose performance was thought able to add novelty to luxury. Such was the appearance of security and delight which this retirement afforded, that they to whom it was new always desired that it might be perpetual; and as those on whom the iron gate had once closed were never suffered to return, the effect of longer experience could not be known. Thus every year produced new schemes of delight and new competitors for imprisonment.

The palace stood on an eminence, raised about thirty paces<sup>4</sup> above the surface of the lake. It was divided into many squares or courts, built with greater or less magnificence according to the rank of those for whom they were designed. The roofs were turned into arches of massy stone, joined with a cement that grew harder by time, and the building stood from century to century, deriding the solstitial rains and equinoctial hurricanes, without need of reparation.

This house, which was so large as to be fully known to none but some ancient officers, who successively inherited the secrets of the place, was built as if suspicion herself had dictated the plan. To every room there was an open and secret passage; every square had a communication with the rest, either from the upper stories by private galleries, or by subterranean passages from the lower apartments. Many of the columns had unsuspected cavities, in which a long race of monarchs had repositied their treasures. They then closed up the opening with marble, which was never to be removed but in the utmost exigencies of the kingdom, and recorded their accumulations in a book, which was itself concealed in a tower, not entered but by the emperor, attended by the prince who stood next in succession.

Chapter 2. The Discontent of Rasselas in the Happy Valley

Here the sons and daughters of Abyssinia lived only to know the soft vicissitudes of pleasure and repose, attended by all that were skillful to delight, and gratified with whatever the senses can enjoy. They wandered in gardens of fragrance, and slept in the fortresses of security. Every art was practiced to make them pleased with their own condition. The sages who instructed them told them of nothing but the miseries of public life, and described all beyond the mountains as regions of calamity, where discord was always raging, and where man preyed upon man.

To heighten their opinion of their own felicity, they were daily entertained with songs, the subject of which was the happy valley. Their appetites were excited by frequent enumerations of different enjoyments, and revelry and merriment was the business of every hour, from the dawn of morning to the close of even.

These methods were generally successful; few of the princes had ever wished to enlarge their bounds, but passed their lives in full conviction that they had all within their reach that art or nature could bestow, and pitied those whom fate had excluded from this seat of tranquility, as the sport of chance and the slaves of misery.

Thus they rose in the morning and lay down at night, pleased with each other and with themselves; all but Rasselas, who, in the twenty-sixth year of his age, began to withdraw himself from their pastimes and assemblies, and to delight in solitary walks and silent meditation. He often sat before tables covered with luxury, and forgot to taste the dainties that were placed before him; he rose abruptly in the midst of the song, and hastily retired beyond the sound of music. His attendants observed the change, and endeavored to renew his love of pleasure. He neglected their officiousness, repulsed their invitations, and spent day after day on the banks of rivulets sheltered with trees, where he sometimes listened to the birds in the branches, sometimes observed the fish playing in the stream, and anon cast his eyes upon the pastures and mountains filled with animals, of which some were biting the herbage, and some sleeping among the bushes.

This singularity of his humor made him much observed. One of the sages, in whose conversation he had formerly delighted, followed him secretly, in hope of discovering the cause of his disquiet. Rasselas, who knew not that anyone was near him, having for some time fixed his eyes upon the goats that were browsing among the rocks, began to compare their condition with his own.

"What," said he, "makes the difference between man and all the rest of the animal creation? Every beast that strays beside me has the same corporal necessities with myself; he is hungry, and crops the grass, he is thirsty, and drinks the stream, his thirst and hunger are appeased, he is satisfied, and sleeps; he rises again, and he is hungry, he is again fed, and is at rest. I am hungry and thirsty like him, but when thirst and hunger cease, I am not at rest; I am, like him, pained with want, but am not, like him, satisfied with fullness. The intermediate hours are tedious and gloomy; I long again to be hungry that I may again quicken my attention. The birds peck the berries or the corn, and fly away to the groves, where they sit in seeming happiness on the branches, and waste their lives in tuning one unvaried series of sounds. I likewise can call the lutanist and the singer, but the sounds that pleased me yesterday weary me today, and will grow yet more wearisome tomorrow. I can discover within me no power of perception which is not glutted with its proper pleasure, yet I do not feel myself delighted. Man has surely some latent sense for which this place affords no gratification, or he has some desires distinct from sense, which must be satisfied before he can be happy."

After this he lifted up his head, and seeing the moon rising, walked towards the palace. As he passed through the fields, and saw the animals around him, "Ye," said he, "are happy, and need not envy me that walk thus among you, burthened with myself; nor do I, ye gentle beings, envy your felicity, for it is not the felicity of man. I have many distresses from which ye are free; I fear pain when I do not feel it; I sometimes shrink at evils recollected, and sometimes start at evils anticipated. Surely the equity of Providence has balanced peculiar sufferings with peculiar enjoyments."

With observations like these the prince amused himself as he returned, uttering them with a plaintive voice, yet with a look that discovered<sup>5</sup> him to feel some complacency in his own perspicacity, and to receive some solace of the miseries of life from consciousness of the delicacy with which he felt, and the eloquence with which he bewailed them. He mingled cheerfully in the diversions of the evening, and all rejoiced to find that his heart was lightened.

Chapter 3. The Wants of Him That Wants Nothing

On the next day his old instructor, imagining that he had now made himself acquainted with his disease of mind, was in the hope of curing it by counsel, and officiously sought an opportunity of conference, which the prince, having long considered him as one whose intellects were exhausted, was not very willing to afford. "Why," said he, "does this man thus intrude upon me; shall I be never suffered to forget those lectures which pleased only while they were new, and to become new again must be forgotten?" He then walked into the wood, and composed himself to his usual meditations; when, before his thoughts had taken any settled form, he perceived his pursuer at his side, and was at first prompted by his impatience to go hastily away; but, being unwilling to offend a man whom he had once revered and still loved, he invited him to sit down with him on the bank.

The old man, thus encouraged, began to lament the change which had been lately observed in the prince, and to inquire why he so often retired from the pleasures of the palace, to loneliness and silence. "I fly from pleasure," said the prince, "because pleasure has ceased to please; I am lonely because I am miserable, and am unwilling to cloud with my presence the happiness of others." "You, sir," said the sage, "are the first who has complained of misery in the happy valle). I hope to convince you that your complaints have no real cause. You are here in full possession of all that the emperor of Abyssinia can bestow; here is neither labor to be endured nor danger to be dreaded, yet here is all that labor or danger can procure or purchase. Look round and tell me which of your wants is without supply; if you want nothing, how are you unhappy?"

"That I want nothing," said the prince, "or that I know not what I want, is the cause of my complaint; if I had any known want, I should have a certain wish; that wish would excite endeavor, and I should not then repine to see the sun move so slowly towards the western mountain, or lament when the day breaks, and sleep will no longer hide me from myself. When I see the kids and the lambs chasing one another, I fancy that I should be happy if I had something to pursue. But, possessing all that I can want, I find one day and one hour exactly like another, except that the latter is still more tedious than the former. Let your experience inform me how the day may now seem as short as in my childhood, while nature was yet fresh and every moment showed me what I never had observed before. I have already enjoyed too much; give me something to desire."

The old man was surprised at this new species of affliction and knew not what to reply, yet was unwilling to be silent. "Sir," said he, "if you had seen the miseries of the world you would know how to value your present state." "Now," said the prince, "you have given me something to desire. I shall long to see the miseries of the world, since the sight of them is necessary to happiness."

Chapter 4. The Prince Continues to Grieve and Muse

At this time the sound of music proclaimed the hour of repast, and the conversation was concluded. The old man went away sufficiently discontented to find that his reasonings had produced the only conclusion which they were intended to prevent. But in the decline of life shame and grief are of short duration; whether it be that we bear easily what we have born long, or that, finding ourselves in age less regarded, we less regard others; or, that we look with slight regard upon afflictions, to which we know that the hand of death is about to put an end.

The prince, whose views were extended to a wider space, could not speedily quiet his emotions. He had been before terrified at the length of life which nature promised him, because he considered that in a long time much must be endured; he now rejoiced in his youth, because in many years much might be done.

This first beam of hope, that had been ever darted into his mind, rekindled youth in his cheeks, and doubled the luster of his eyes. He was fired with the desire of doing something, though he knew not yet with distinctness, either end or means.

He was now no longer gloomy and unsocial; but, considering himself as master of a secret stock of happiness, which he could enjoy only by concealing it, he affected to be busy in all schemes of diversion, and endeavored to make others pleased with the state of which he himself was weary. But pleasures never can be so multiplied or continued, as not to leave much of life unemployed; there were many hours, both of the night and day, which he could spend without suspicion in solitary thought. The load of life was much lightened: he went eagerly into the assemblies, because he supposed the frequency of his presence necessary to the success of his purposes; he retired gladly to privacy, because he had now a subject of thought.

His chief amusement was to picture to himself that world which he had never seen; to place himself in various conditions; to be entangled in imaginary difficulties, and to be engaged in wild adventures: but his benevolence always terminated his projects in the relief of distress, the detection of fraud, the defeat of oppression, and the diffusion of happiness.

Thus passed twenty months of the life of Rasselas. He busied himself so intensely in visionary bustle, that he forgot his real solitude; and, amidst hourly preparations for the various incidents of human affairs, neglected to consider by what means he should mingle with mankind.

One day, as he was sitting on a bank, he feigned to himself an orphan virgin robbed of her little portion<sup>6</sup> by a treacherous lover, and crying after him for restitution and redress. So strongly was the image impressed upon his mind, that he started up in the maid's defense, and ran forward to seize the plunderer with all the eagerness of real pursuit. Fear naturally quickens the flight of guilt. Rasselas could not catch the fugitive with his utmost efforts; but, resolving to weary, by perseverance, him whom he could not surpass in speed, he pressed on till the foot of the mountain stopped his course.

Here he recollected himself, and smiled at his own useless impetuosity. Then raising his eyes to the mountain, "This," said he, "is the fatal obstacle that hinders at once the enjoyment of pleasure, and the exercise of virtue. How long is it that my hopes and wishes have flown beyond this boundary of my life, which yet I never have attempted to surmount!"

Struck with this reflection, he sat down to muse, and remembered, that since he first resolved to escape from his confinement, the sun had passed twice over him in his annual course. He now felt a degree of regret with which he had never been before acquainted. He considered how much might have been done in the time which had passed, and left nothing real behind it. He compared twenty months with the life of man. "In life," said he, "is not to be counted the ignorance of infancy, or imbecility<sup>7</sup> of age. We are long before we are able to think, and we soon cease from the power of acting. The true period of human existence may be reasonably estimated as forty years, of which I have mused away the four and twentieth part. What I have lost was certain, for I have certainly possessed it; but of twenty months to come who can assure me?"

The consciousness of his own folly pierced him deeply, and he was long before he could be reconciled to himself. "The rest of my time," said he, "has been lost by the crime or folly of my ancestors, and the absurd institutions of

6. Money or goods.

7. Weakness.

my country; I remember it with disgust, yet without remorse: but the months that have passed since new light darted into my soul, since I formed a scheme of reasonable felicity, have been squandered by my own fault. I have lost that which can never be restored: I have seen the sun rise and set for twenty months, an idle gazer on the light of heaven. In this time the birds have left the nest of their mother, and committed themselves to the woods and to the skies: the kid has forsaken the teat, and learned by degrees to climb the rocks in quest of independent sustenance. I only have made no advances, but am still helpless and ignorant. The moon, by more than twenty changes, admonished me of the flux of life; the stream that rolled before my feet upbraided my inactivity. I sat feasting on intellectual luxury, regardless alike of the examples of the earth, and the instructions of the planets. Twenty months are past, who shall restore them!"

These sorrowful meditations fastened upon his mind; he passed four months in resolving to lose no more time in idle resolves, and was awakened to more vigorous exertion by hearing a maid, who had broken a porcelain cup, remark that what cannot be repaired is not to be regretted.

This was obvious; and Rasselas reproached himself that he had not discovered it, having not known, or not considered, how many useful hints are obtained by chance, and how often the mind, hurried by her own ardor to distant views, neglects the truths that lie open before her. He, for a few hours, regretted his regret, and from that time bent his whole mind upon the means of escaping from the valley of happiness.

Chapter 5. The Prince Meditates His Escape

He now found that it would be very difficult to effect that which it was very easy to suppose effected. When he looked round about him, he saw himself confined by the bars of nature which had never yet been broken, and by the gate, through which none that once had passed it were ever able to return. He was now impatient as an eagle in a grate.<sup>8</sup> He passed week after week in clambering the mountains, to see if there was any aperture which the bushes might conceal, but found all the summits inaccessible by their prominence. The iron gate he despaired to open; for it was not only secured with all the power of art, but was always watched by successive sentinels, and was by its position exposed to the perpetual observation of all the inhabitants.

He then examined the cavern through which the waters of the lake were discharged; and, looking down at a time when the sun shone strongly upon its mouth, he discovered it to be full of broken rocks, which, though they permitted the stream to flow through many narrow passages, would stop any body of solid bulk. He returned discouraged and dejected; but, having now known the blessing of hope, resolved never to despair.

In these fruitless searches he spent ten months. The time, however, passed cheerfully away: in the morning he rose with new hope, in the evening applauded his own diligence, and in the night slept sound after his fatigue. He met a thousand amusements which beguiled his labor, and diversified his thoughts. He discerned the various instincts of animals, and properties of plants, and found the place replete with wonders, of which he purposed to solace himself with the contemplation, if he should never be able to accomplish his flight; rejoicing that his endeavors, though yet unsuccessful, had supplied him with a source of inexhaustible enquiry.

But his original curiosity was not yet abated; he resolved to obtain some knowledge of the ways of men. His wish still continued, but his hope grew less. He ceased to survey any longer the walls of his prison, and spared to search by new toils for interstices which he knew could not be found, yet determined to keep his design always in view, and lay hold on any expedient that time should offer.

Chapter 6. A Dissertation on the Art of Flying

Among the artists that had been allured into the happy valley, to labor for the accommodation and pleasure of its inhabitants, was a man eminent for his knowledge of the mechanic powers, who had contrived many engines<sup>9</sup> both of use and recreation. By a wheel, which the stream turned, he forced the water into a tower, whence it was distributed to all the apartments of the palace. He erected a pavillion in the garden, around which he kept the air always cool by artificial showers. One of the groves appropriated to the ladies, was ventilated by fans, to which the rivulet that run through it gave a constant motion; and instruments of soft music were placed at proper distances, of which some played by the impulse of the wind, and some by the power of the stream.

This artist was sometimes visited by Rasselas, who was pleased with every kind of knowledge, imagining that the time would come when all his acquisitions should be of use to him in the open world. He came one day to amuse himself in his usual manner, and found the master busy in building a sailing chariot: he saw that the design was practicable upon a level surface, and with expressions of great esteem solicited its completion. The workman was pleased to find himself so much regarded by the prince, and resolved to gain yet higher honors. "Sir," said he, "you have seen but a small part of what the mechanic sciences can perform. I have been long of opinion, that, instead of the tardy conveyance of ships and chariots, man might use the swifter migration of wings; that the fields of air are open to knowledge, and that only ignorance and idleness need crawl upon the ground."

This hint rekindled the prince's desire of passing the mountains; having seen what the mechanist had already performed, he was willing to fancy that he could do more; yet resolved to inquire further before he suffered hope to afflict him by disappointment. "I am afraid," said he to the artist, "that your imagination prevails over your skill, and that you now tell me rather what you wish than what you know. Every animal has his element assigned him; the birds have the air, and man and beasts the earth." "So," replied the mechanist, "fishes have the water, in which yet beasts can swim by nature, and men by art. He that can swim needs not despair to fly: to swim is to fly in a grosser fluid, and to fly is to swim in a subtler.<sup>1</sup> We are only to proportion our power of resistance to the different density of the matter through which we are to pass. You will be necessarily upborn by the air, if you can renew any impulse upon it, faster than the air can recede from the pressure."

"But the exercise of swimming," said the prince, "is very laborious; the

9. Machines. "Mechanic powers": the forces that cause things to move.

1. Thinner,

strongest limbs are soon wearied; I am afraid the act of flying will be yet more violent, and wings will be of no great use, unless we can fly further than we can swim."

"The labor of rising from the ground," said the artist, "will be great, as we see it in the heavier domestic fowls; but, as we mount higher, the earth's attraction, and the body's gravity, will be gradually diminished, till we shall arrive at a region where the man will float in the air without any tendency to fall: no care will then be necessary, but to move forwards, which the gentlest impulse will effect. You, Sir, whose curiosity is so extensive, will easily conceive with what pleasure a philosopher, furnished with wings, and hovering in the sky, would see the earth, and all its inhabitants, rolling beneath him, and presenting to him successively, by its diurnal motion, all the countries within the same parallel. How must it amuse the pendent spectator to see the moving scene of land and ocean, cities and deserts! To survey with equal security the marts of trade, and the fields of battle; mountains infested by barbarians, and fruitful regions gladdened by plenty, and lulled by peace! How easily shall we then trace the Nile through all his passage; pass over to distant regions, and examine the face of nature from one extremity of the earth to the other!"

"All this," said the prince, "is much to be desired, but I am afraid that no man will be able to breathe in these regions of speculation and tranquility. I have been told, that respiration is difficult upon lofty mountains, yet from these precipices, though so high as to produce great tenuity of the air, it is very easy to fall: therefore I suspect, that from any height, where life can be supported, there may be danger of too quick descent."

"Nothing," replied the artist, "will ever be attempted, if all possible objections must be first overcome. If you will favor my project I will try the first flight at my own hazard. I have considered the structure of all volant<sup>2</sup> animals, and find the folding continuity of the bat's wings most easily accommodated to the human form. Upon this model I shall begin my task tomorrow, and in a year expect to tower into the air beyond the malice or pursuit of man. But I will work only on this condition, that the art shall not be divulged, and that you shall not require me to make wings for any but ourselves."

"Why," said Rasselas, "should you envy others so great an advantage? All skill ought to be exerted for universal good; every man has owed much to others, and ought to repay the kindness that he has received."

"If men were all virtuous," returned the artist, "I should with great alacrity teach them all to fly. But what would be the security of the good, if the bad could at pleasure invade them from the sky? Against an army sailing through the clouds neither walls, nor mountains, nor seas, could afford any security. A flight of northern savages might hover in the wind, and light at once with irresistible violence upon the capital of a fruitful region that was rolling under them. Even this valley, the retreat of princes, the abode of happiness, might be violated by the sudden descent of some of the naked nations that swarm on the coast of the southern sea."

The prince promised secrecy, and waited for the performance, not wholly hopeless of success. He visited the work from time to time, observed its progress, and remarked many ingenious contrivances to facilitate motion, and unite levity with strength. The artist was every day more certain that he should leave vultures and eagles behind him, and the contagion of his confidence seized upon the prince.

In a year the wings were finished, and, on a morning appointed, the maker appeared furnished for flight on a little promontory: he waved his pinions a while to gather air, then leaped from his stand, and in an instant dropped into the lake. His wings, which were of no use in the air, sustained him in the water, and the prince drew him to land, half dead with terror and vexation.

Chapter 7. The Prince Finds a Man of Learning

The prince was not much afflicted by this disaster, having suffered himself to hope for a happier event, only because he had no other means of escape in view. He still persisted in his design to leave the happy valley by the first opportunity.

His imagination was now at a stand; he had no prospect of entering into the world; and, notwithstanding all his endeavors to support himself, discontent by degrees preyed upon him, and he began again to lose his thoughts in sadness, when the rainy season, which in these countries is periodical, made it inconvenient to wander in the woods.

The rain continued longer and with more violence than had been ever known; the clouds broke on the surrounding mountains, and the torrents streamed into the plain on every side, till the cavern was too narrow to discharge the water. The lake overflowed its banks, and all the level of the valley was covered with the inundation. The eminence, on which the palace was built, and some other spots of rising ground, were all that the eye could now discover. The herds and flocks left the pastures, and both the wild beasts and the tame retreated to the mountains.

This inundation confined all the princes to domestic amusements, and the attention of Rasselas was particularly seized by a poem, which Imlac rehearsed,<sup>3</sup> upon the various conditions of humanity. He commanded the poet to attend him in his apartment, and recite his verses a second time; then entering into familiar talk, he thought himself happy in having found a man who knew the world so well, and could so skillfully paint the scenes of life. He asked a thousand questions about things, to which, though common to all other mortals, his confinement from childhood had kept him a stranger. The poet pitied his ignorance, and loved his curiosity, and entertained him from day to day with novelty and instruction, so that the prince regretted the necessity of sleep, and longed till the morning should renew his pleasure.

As they were sitting together, the prince commanded Imlac to relate his history, and to tell by what accident he was forced, or by what motive induced, to close his life in the happy valley. As he was going to begin his narrative, Rasselas was called to a concert, and obliged to restrain his curiosity till the evening.

ceased, and the princesses retired. Rasselas then called for his companion and required him to begin the story of his life.

"Sir," said Imlac, "my history will not be long: the life that is devoted to knowledge passes silently away, and is very little diversified by events. To talk in public, to think in solitude, to read and to hear, to inquire, and answer inquiries, is the business of a scholar. He wanders about the world without pomp or terror, and is neither known nor valued but by men like himself.

"I was born in the kingdom of Goiama, at no great distance from the fountain of the Nile. My father was a wealthy merchant, who traded between the inland countries of Africk and the ports of the red sea. He was honest, frugal and diligent, but of mean sentiments, and narrow comprehension: he desired only to be rich, and to conceal his riches, lest he should be spoiled<sup>4</sup> by the governors of the province."

"Surely," said the prince, "my father must be negligent of his charge, if any man in his dominions dares take that which belongs to another. Does he not know that kings are accountable for injustice permitted as well as done? If I were emperor, not the meanest of my subjects should be oppressed with impunity. My blood boils when I am told that a merchant durst not enjoy his honest gains for fear of losing them by the rapacity of power. Name the governor who robbed the people, that I may declare his crimes to the emperor."

"Sir," said Imlac, "your ardor is the natural effect of virtue animated by youth: the time will come when you will acquit your father, and perhaps hear with less impatience of the governor. Oppression is, in the Abyssinian dominions, neither frequent nor tolerated; but no form of government has been yet discovered, by which cruelty can be wholly prevented. Subordination supposes power on one part and subjection on the other; and if power be in the hands of men, it will sometimes be abused. The vigilance of the supreme magistrate may do much, but much will still remain undone. He can never know all the crimes that are committed, and can seldom punish all that he knows."

"This," said the prince, "I do not understand, but I had rather hear thee than dispute. Continue thy narration."

"My father," proceeded Imlac, "originally intended that I should have no other education, than such as might qualify me for commerce; and discovering in me great strength of memory, and quickness of apprehension, often declared his hope that I should be some time the richest man in Abyssinia."

"Why," said the prince, "did thy father desire the increase of his wealth, when it was already greater than he durst discover or enjoy? I am unwilling to doubt thy veracity, yet inconsistencies cannot both be true."

"Inconsistencies," answered Imlac, "cannot both be right, but, imputed to man, they may both be true. Yet diversity is not inconsistency. My father might expect a time of greater security. However, some desire is necessary to keep life in motion, and he, whose real wants are supplied, must admit those of fancy."

"This," said the prince, "I can in some measure conceive. I repent that I interrupted thee."

"With this hope," proceeded Imlac, "he sent me to school; but when I had once found the delight of knowledge, and felt the pleasure of intelligence<sup>5</sup> and the pride of invention, I began silently to despise riches, and determined to disappoint the purpose of my father, whose grossness of conception raised my pity. I was twenty years old before his tenderness would expose me to the fatigue of travel, in which time I had been instructed, by successive masters, in all the literature of my native country. As every hour taught me something new, I lived in a continual course of gratifications; but, as I advanced towards manhood, I lost much of the reverence with which I had been used to look on my instructors; because, when the lesson was ended, I did not find them wiser or better than common men.

"At length my father resolved to initiate me in commerce, and, opening one of his subterranean treasuries, counted out ten thousand pieces of gold. 'This, young man,' said he, 'is the stock with which you must negotiate.'<sup>6</sup> I began with less than the fifth part, and you see how diligence and parsimony have increased it. This is your own to waste or to improve. If you squander it by negligence or caprice, you must wait for my death before you will be rich: if, in four years, you double your stock, we will thenceforward let subordination cease, and live together as friends and partners; for he shall always be equal with me, who is equally skilled in the art of growing rich.'

"We laid our money upon camels, concealed in bales of cheap goods, and travelled to the shore of the Red Sea. When I cast my eye on the expanse of waters my heart bounded like that of a prisoner escaped. I felt an unextinguishable curiosity kindle in my mind, and resolved to snatch this opportunity of seeing the manners of other nations, and of learning sciences unknown in Abyssinia.

"I remembered that my father had obliged me to the improvement of my stock, not by a promise which I ought not to violate, but by a penalty which I was at liberty to incur; and therefore determined to gratify my predominant desire, and by drinking at the fountains of knowledge, to quench the thirst of curiosity.

"As I was supposed to trade without connection with my father, it was easy for me to become acquainted with the master of a ship, and procure a passage to some other country. I had no motives of choice to regulate my voyage; it was sufficient for me that, wherever I wandered, I should see a country which I had not seen before. I therefore entered a ship bound for Surat,<sup>7</sup> having left a letter for my father declaring my intention.

Chapter 9. The History of Imlac Continued

"When I first entered upon the world of waters, and lost sight of land, I looked round about me with pleasing terror, and thinking my soul enlarged by the boundless prospect, imagined that I could gaze round for ever without satiety; but, in a short time, I grew weary of looking on barren uniformity, where I could only see again what I had already seen. I then descended into the ship, and doubted for a while whether all my future pleasures would not end like this in disgust and disappointment. Yet, surely, said I, the ocean and the land are very different; the only variety of water is rest and motion, but the earth has mountains and valleys, deserts and cities: it is inhabited by men of different customs and contrary opinions; and I may hope to find variety in life, though I should miss it in nature.

"With this thought I quieted my mind; and amused myself during the voyage, sometimes by learning from the sailors the art of navigation, which I have never practiced, and sometimes by forming schemes for my conduct in different situations, in not one of which I have been ever placed.

"I was almost weary of my naval amusements when we landed safely at Surat. I secured my money, and purchasing some commodities for show, joined myself to a caravan that was passing into the inland country. My companions, for some reason or other, conjecturing that I was rich, and, by my inquiries and admiration, finding that I was ignorant, considered me as a novice whom they had a right to cheat, and who was to learn at the usual expense the art of fraud. They exposed me to the theft of servants, and the exaction of officers,<sup>8</sup> and saw me plundered upon false pretences, without any advantage to themselves, but that of rejoicing in the superiority of their own knowledge."

"Stop a moment," said the prince. "Is there such depravity in man, as that he should injure another without benefit to himself? I can easily conceive that all are pleased with superiority; but your ignorance was merely accidental, which, being neither your crime nor your folly, could afford them no reason to applaud themselves; and the knowledge which they had, and which you wanted, they might as effectually have shown by warning, as betraying you."

"Pride," said Imlac, "is seldom delicate, it will please itself with very mean advantages; and envy feels not its own happiness, but when it may be compared with the misery of others. They were my enemies because they grieved to think me rich, and my oppressors because they delighted to find me weak."

"Proceed," said the prince: "I doubt not of the facts which you relate, but imagine that you impute them to mistaken motives."

"In this company," said Imlac, "I arrived at Agra, the capital of Indostan, the city in which the great Mogul commonly resides. I applied myself to the language of the country, and in a few months was able to converse with the learned men; some of whom I found morose and reserved, and others easy and communicative; some were unwilling to teach another what they had with difficulty learned themselves; and some showed that the end of their studies was to gain the dignity of instructing.

"To the tutor of the young princes I recommended myself so much, that I was presented to the emperor as a man of uncommon knowledge. The emperor asked me many questions concerning my country and my travels; and though I cannot now recollect any thing that he uttered above the power of a common man, he dismissed me astonished at his wisdom, and enamored of his goodness.

"My credit was now so high, that the merchants, with whom I had traveled, applied to me for recommendations to the ladies of the court. I was surprised at their confidence of solicitation, and gently reproached them with their practices on the road. They heard me with cold indifference, and showed no tokens of shame or sorrow.

"They then urged their request with the offer of a bribe; but what I would not do for kindness I would not do for money; and refused them, not because they had injured me, but because I would not enable them to injure others; for I knew they would have made use of my credit to cheat those who should buy their wares.

"Having resided at Agra till there was no more to be learned, I traveled into Persia, where I saw many remains of ancient magnificence, and observed many new accommodations<sup>9</sup> of life. The Persians are a nation eminently social, and their assemblies afforded me daily opportunities of remarking characters and manners, and of tracing human nature through all its variations.

9. "Conveniences, things requisite to ease or refreshment" (Johnson's Dictionary).

"From Persia I passed into Arabia, where I saw a nation at once pastoral and warlike; who live without any settled habitation; whose only wealth is their flocks and herds; and who have yet carried on, through all ages, an hereditary war with all mankind, though they neither covet nor envy their possessions.

Chapter 10. Imlac's History Continued. A Dissertation upon Poetry

"Wherever I went, I found that poetry was considered as the highest learning, and regarded with a veneration somewhat approaching to that which man would pay to the angelic nature. And yet it fills me with wonder that, in almost all countries, the most ancient poets are considered as the best: whether it be that every other kind of knowledge is an acquisition gradually attained, and poetry is a gift conferred at once; or that the first poetry of every nation surprised them as a novelty, and retained the credit by consent which it received by accident at first; or whether, as the province of poetry is to describe nature and passion, which are always the same, the first writers took possession of the most striking objects for description and the most probable occurrences for fiction, and left nothing to those that followed them, but transcription of the same events, and new combinations of the same images—whatever be the reason, it is commonly observed that the early writers are in possession of nature, and their followers of art; that the first excel in strength and invention, and the latter in elegance and refinement.

"I was desirous to add my name to this illustrious fraternity. I read all the poets of Persia and Arabia, and was able to repeat by memory the volumes that are suspended in the mosque of Mecca.<sup>1</sup> But I soon found that no man was ever great by imitation. My desire of excellence impelled me to transfer my attention to nature and to life. Nature was to be my subject, and men to be my auditors: I could never describe what I had not seen; I could not hope to move those with delight or terror, whose interests and opinions I did not understand.

"Being now resolved to be a poet, I saw everything with a new purpose; my sphere of attention was suddenly magnified; no kind of knowledge was to be overlooked. I ranged mountains and deserts for images and resemblances, and pictured upon my mind every tree of the forest and flower of the valley. I observed with equal care the crags of the rock and the pinnacles of the palace. Sometimes I wandered along the mazes of the rivulet, and sometimes watched the changes of the summer clouds. To a poet nothing can be useless. Whatever is beautiful, and whatever is dreadful, must be familiar to his imagination; he must be conversant with all that is awfully<sup>2</sup> vast or elegantly little. The plants of the garden, the animals of the wood, the minerals of the earth, and meteors of the sky, must all concur to store his mind with inexhaustible variety: for every idea<sup>3</sup> is useful for the enforcement or decoration of moral or religious truth; and he who knows most will have most power of diversifying his scenes, and of gratifying his reader with remote allusions and unexpected instruction.

"All the appearances of nature I was therefore careful to study, and every country which I have surveyed has contributed something to my poetical powers."

"In so wide a survey," said the prince, "you must surely have left much unobserved. I have lived till now within the circuit of these mountains, and yet cannot walk abroad without the sight of something which I have never beheld before, or never heeded."

"The business of a poet," said Imlac, "is to examine, not the individual, but the species; to remark general properties and large appearances; he does not number the streaks of the tulip, or describe the different shades in the verdure of the forest. He is to exhibit in his portraits of nature such prominent and striking features as recall the original to every mind, and must neglect the minuter discriminations, which one may have remarked and another have neglected, for those characteristics which are alike obvious to vigilance and carelessness.

"But the knowledge of nature is only half the task of a poet; he must be acquainted likewise with all the modes of life. His character requires that he estimate the happiness and misery of every condition; observe the power of all the passions in all their combinations, and trace the changes of the human mind, as they are modified by various institutions and accidental influences of climate or custom, from the sprightliness of infancy to the despondence of decrepitude. He must divest himself of the prejudices of his age or country; he must consider right and wrong in their abstracted and invariable state; he must disregard present laws and opinions, and rise to general and transcendental<sup>4</sup> truths, which will always be the same. He must, therefore, content himself with the slow progress of his name, contemn the applause of his own time, and commit his claims to the justice of posterity. He must write as the interpreter of nature and the legislator of mankind, and consider himself as presiding over the thoughts and manners of future generations, as a being superior to time and place.

"His labor is not yet at an end; he must know many languages and many sciences; and, that his style may be worthy of his thoughts, must by incessant practice familiarize to himself every delicacy of speech and grace of harmony."

Chapter 11. Imlac's Narrative Continued. A Hint on Pilgrimage

Imlac now felt the enthusiastic fit, and was proceeding to aggrandize his own profession, when the prince cried out: "Enough! thou hast convinced me that no human being can ever be a poet. Proceed with thy narration."

"To be a poet," said Imlac, "is indeed very difficult." "So difficult," returned the prince, "that I will at present hear no more of his labors. Tell me whither you went when you had seen Persia."

"From Persia," said the poet, "I traveled through Syria, and for three years resided in Palestine, where I conversed with great numbers of the northern and western nations of Europe, the nations which are now in possession of all power and all knowledge, whose armies are irresistible, and whose fleets command the remotest parts of the globe. When I compared these men with the natives of our own kingdom, and those that surround us, they appeared almost another order of beings. In their countries it is difficult to wish for anything that may not be obtained; a thousand arts, of which we never heard, are continually laboring for their convenience and pleasure; and whatever their own climate has denied them is supplied by their commerce."

"Ry what means," said the prince, "are the Europeans thus powerful, or why, since they can so easily visit Asia and Africa for trade or conquest, cannot the Asiatics and Africans invade their coasts, plant colonies in their ports, and give laws to their natural princes? The same wind that carries them back would bring us thither."

"They are more powerful, sir, than we," answered Imlac, "because they are wiser; knowledge will always predominate over ignorance, as man governs the other animals. But why their knowledge is more than ours, I know not what reason can be given, but the unsearchable will of the Supreme Being."

"When," said the prince with a sigh, "shall I be able to visit Palestine, and mingle with this mighty confluence of nations? Till that happy moment shall arrive, let me fill up the time with such representations as thou canst give me. I am not ignorant of the motive that assembles such numbers in that place, and cannot but consider it as the center of wisdom and piety, to which the best and wisest men of every land must be continually resorting."

"There are some nations," said Imlac, "that send few visitants to Palestine; for many numerous and learned sects in Europe concur to censure pilgrimage as superstitious, or deride it as ridiculous."

"You know," said the prince, "how little my life has made me acquainted with diversity of opinions. It will be too long to hear the arguments on both sides; you, that have considered them, tell me the result."

"Pilgrimage," said Imlac, "like many other acts of piety, may be reasonable or superstitious, according to the principles upon which it is performed. Long journeys in search of truth are not commanded. Truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life, is always found where it is honestly sought. Change of place is no natural cause of the increase of piety, for it inevitably produces dissipation of mind. Yet, since men go every day to view the fields where great actions have been performed, and return with stronger impressions of the event, curiosity of the same land may naturally dispose us to view that country whence our religion had its beginning; and I believe no man surveys those awful scenes without some confirmation of holy resolutions. That the Supreme Being may be more easily propitiated in one place than in another is the dream of idle superstition, but that some places may operate upon our own minds in an uncommon manner is an opinion which hourly experience will justify. He who supposes that his vices may be more successfully combated in Palestine, will, perhaps, find himself mistaken, yet he may go thither without folly; he who thinks they will be more freely pardoned, dishonors at once his reason and religion."

"These," said the prince, "are European distinctions. I will consider them another time. What have you found to be the effect of knowledge? Are those nations happier than we?"

"There is so much infelicity," said the poet, "in the world that scarce any man has leisure from his own distresses to estimate the comparative happiness of others. Knowledge is certainly one of the means of pleasure, as is confessed by the natural desire which every mind feels of increasing its ideas. Ignorance is mere privation, by which nothing can be produced; it is a vacancy in which the soul sits motionless and torpid for want of attraction; and, without knowing why, we always rejoice when we learn, and grieve when we forget. I am therefore inclined to conclude that if nothing counteracts the natural consequence of learning, we grow more happy as our minds take a wider range.

"In enumerating the particular comforts of life, we shall find many advantages on the side of the Europeans. They cure wounds and diseases with which we languish and perish. We suffer inclemencies of weather which they can obviate. They have engines for the despatch of many laborious works, which we must perform by manual industry. There is such communication between distant places that one friend can hardly be said to be absent from another. Their policy removes all public inconveniences; they have roads cut through their mountains, and bridges laid upon their rivers. And, if we descend to the privacies of life, their habitations are more commodious, and their possessions are more secure."

"They are surely happy," said the prince, "who have all these conveniencies, of which I envy none so much as the facility with which separated friends interchange their thoughts."

"The Europeans," answered Imlac, "are less unhappy than we, but they are not happy. Human life is everywhere a state in which much is to be endured, and little to be enjoyed."

"I am not yet willing," said the prince, "to suppose that happiness is so parsimoniously distributed to mortals; nor can believe but that, if I had the choice of life, I should be able to fill every day with pleasure. I would injure no man, and should provoke no resentment: I would relieve every distress, and should enjoy the benedictions of gratitude. I would choose my friends among the wise, and my wife among the virtuous; and therefore should be in no danger from treachery, or unkindness. My children should, by my care, be learned and pious, and would repay to my age what their childhood had received. What would dare to molest him who might call on every side to thousands enriched by his bounty, or assisted by his power? And why should not life glide quietly away in the soft reciprocation of protection and reverence? All this may be done without the help of European refinements, which appear by their effects to be rather specious than useful. Let us leave them and pursue our journey."

"From Palestine," said Imlac, "I passed through many regions of Asia; in the more civilized kingdoms as a trader, and among the barbarians of the mountains as a pilgrim. At last I began to long for my native country, that I might repose after my travels, and fatigues, in the places where I had spent my earliest years, and gladden my old companions with the recital of my adventures. Often did I figure to myself those, with whom I had sported away the gay hours of dawning life, sitting round me in its evening, wondering at my tales, and listening to my counsels.

"When this thought had taken possession of my mind, I considered every moment as wasted which did not bring me nearer to Abyssinia. I hastened into Egypt, and, notwithstanding my impatience, was detained ten months in the contemplation of its ancient magnificence, and in enquiries after the remains of its ancient learning. I found in Cairo a mixture of all nations; some brought thither by the love of knowledge, some by the hope of gain, and many by the desire of living after their own manner without observation, and of lying hid in the obscurity of multitudes: for, in a city, populous as Cairo, it is possible to obtain at the same time the gratifications of society, and the secrecy of solitude.

"From Cairo I traveled to Suez, and embarked on the Red Sea, passing along the coast till I arrived at the port from which I had departed twenty years before. Here I joined myself to a caravan and re-entered my native country.

"I now expected the caresses of my kinsmen, and the congratulations of my friends, and was not without hope that my father, whatever value he had set upon riches, would own with gladness and pride a son who was able to add to the felicity and honor of the nation. But I was soon convinced that my thoughts were vain. My father had been dead fourteen years, having divided his wealth among my brothers, who were removed to some other provinces. Of my companions the greater part was in the grave, of the rest some could with difficulty remember me, and some considered me as one corrupted by foreign manners.

"A man used to vicissitudes is not easily dejected. I forgot, after a time, my disappointment, and endeavored to recommend myself to the nobles of the kingdom: they admitted me to their tables, heard my story, and dismissed me. I opened a school, and was prohibited to teach. I then resolved to sit down in the quiet of domestic life, and addressed a lady that was fond of my conversation, but rejected my suit, because my father was a merchant.

"Wearied at last with solicitation and repulses, I resolved to hide myself for ever from the world, and depend no longer on the opinion or caprice of others. I waited for the time when the gate of the happy valley should open, that I might bid farewell to hope and fear: the day came; my performance was distinguished with favor, and I resigned myself with joy to perpetual confinement."

"Hast thou here found happiness at last?" said Rasselas. "Tell me without reserve; art thou content with thy condition? or, dost thou wish to be again wandering and inquiring? All the inhabitants of this valley celebrate their lot, and, at the annual visit of the emperor, invite others to partake of their felicity."

"Great prince," said Imlac, "I shall speak the truth: I know not one of all your attendants who does not lament the hour when he entered this retreat. I am less unhappy than the rest, because I have a mind replete with images, which I can vary and combine at pleasure. I can amuse my solitude by the renovation of the knowledge which begins to fade from my memory, and by recollection of the accidents of my past life. Yet all this ends in the sorrowful consideration, that my acquirements are now useless, and that none of my pleasures can be again enjoyed. The rest, whose minds have no impression but of the present moment, are either corroded by malignant passions, or sit stupid in the gloom of perpetual vacancy."

"What passions can infest those," said the prince, "who have no trials? We are in a place where impotence precludes malice, and where all envy is repressed by community<sup>5</sup> of enjoyments."

"There may be community," said Imlac, "of material possessions, but there can never be community of love or of esteem. It must happen that one will please more than another; he that knows himself despised will always be envious; and still more envious and malevolent, if he is condemned to live in the presence of those who despise him. The invitations, by which they allure others to a state which they feel to be wretched, proceed from the natural malignity of hopeless misery. They are weary of themselves, and of each other, and expect to find relief in new companions. They envy the liberty which their folly has forfeited, and would gladly see all mankind imprisoned like themselves.

"From this crime, however, I am wholly free. No man can say that he is wretched by my persuasion. I look with pity on the crowds who are annually soliciting admission to captivity, and wish that it were lawful for me to warn them of their danger."

"My dear Imlac," said the prince, "I will open to thee my whole heart. I have long meditated an escape from the happy valley. I have examined the mountains on every side, but find myself insuperably barred: teach me the way to break my prison; thou shalt be the companion of my flight, the guide of my rambles, the partner of my fortune, and my sole director in the choice of life."

"Sir," answered the poet, "your escape will be difficult, and, perhaps, you may soon repent your curiosity. The world, which you figure to yourself smooth and quiet as the lake in the valley, you will find a sea foaming with tempests, and boiling with whirlpools: you will be sometimes overwhelmed by the waves of violence, and sometimes dashed against the rocks of treachery. Amidst wrongs and frauds, competitions and anxieties, you will wish a thousand times for these seats of quiet, and willingly quit hope to be free from fear."

"Do not seek to deter me from my purpose," said the prince: "I am impatient to see what thou hast seen; and, since thou art thyself weary of the valley, it is evident, that thy former state was better than this. Whatever be the consequence of my experiment, I am resolved to judge with my own eyes of the various conditions of men, and then to make deliberately my choice of life."

"I am afraid," said Imlac, "you are hindered by stronger restraints than my persuasions; yet, if your determination is fixed, I do not counsel you to despair. Few things are impossible to diligence and skill."

Chapter 13. Rasselas Discovers the Means of Escape

The prince now dismissed his favorite to rest, but the narrative of wonders and novelties filled his mind with perturbation. He revolved all that he had heard, and prepared innumerable questions for the morning.

Much of his uneasiness was now removed. He had a friend to whom he could impart his thoughts, and whose experience could assist him in his designs. His heart was no longer condemned to swell with silent vexation. He thought that even the happy valley might be endured with such a companion, and that, if they could range the world together, he should have nothing further to desire.

In a few days the water was discharged, and the ground dried. The prince and Imlac then walked out together to converse without the notice of the rest. The prince, whose thoughts were always on the wing, as he passed by the gate, said, with a countenance of sorrow, "Why art thou so strong, and why is man so weak?"

"Man is not weak," answered his companion; "knowledge is more than equivalent to force. The master of mechanics laughs at strength. I can burst the gate, but cannot do it secretly. Some other expedient must be tried."

As they were walking on the side of the mountain, they observed that the conies,<sup>6</sup> which the rain had driven from their burrows, had taken shelter among the bushes, and formed holes behind them, tending upwards in an oblique line. "It has been the opinion of antiquity," said Imlac, "that human reason borrowed many arts from the instinct of animals; let us, therefore, not think ourselves degraded by learning from the coney. We may escape by piercing the mountain in the same direction. We will begin where the summit hangs over the middle part, and labor upward till we shall issue out beyond the prominence."

6. Rabbits.

The eyes of the prince, when he heard this proposal, sparkled with joy. The execution was easy, and the success certain.

No time was now lost. They hastened early in the morning to choose a place proper for their mine. They clambered with great fatigue among crags and brambles, and returned without having discovered any part that favored their design. The second and the third day were spent in the same manner, and with the same frustration. But, on the fourth, they found a small cavern, concealed by a thicket, where they resolved to make their experiment.

Imlac procured instruments proper to hew stone and remove earth, and they fell to their work on the next day with more eagerness than vigor. They were presently exhausted by their efforts, and sat down to pant upon the grass. The prince, for a moment, appeared to be discouraged. "Sir," said his companion, "practice will enable us to continue our labor for a longer time; mark, however, how far we have advanced, and you will find that our toil will some time have an end. Great works are performed, not by strength, but perseverance: yonder palace was raised by single stones, yet you see its height and spaciousness. He that shall walk with vigor three hours a day will pass in seven years a space equal to the circumference of the globe."

They returned to their work day after day, and, in a short time, found a fissure in the rock, which enabled them to pass far with very little obstruction. This Rasselas considered as a good omen. "Do not disturb your mind," said Imlac, "with other hopes or fears than reason may suggest: if you are pleased with prognostics of good, you will be terrified likewise with tokens of evil, and your whole life will be a prey to superstition. Whatever facilitates our work is more than an omen, it is a cause of success. This is one of those pleasing surprises which often happen to active resolution. Many things difficult to design prove easy to performance."

Chapter 14. Rasselas and Imlac Receive an Unexpected Visit

They had now wrought their way to the middle, and solaced their toil with the approach of liberty, when the prince, coming down to refresh himself with air, found his sister Nekayah standing before the mouth of the cavity. He started and stood confused, afraid to tell his design, and yet hopeless to conceal it. A few moments determined him to repose on her fidelity, and secure her secrecy by a declaration without reserve.

"Do not imagine," said the princess, "that I came hither as a spy: I had long observed from my window, that you and Imlac directed your walk every day towards the same point, but I did not suppose you had any better reason for the preference than a cooler shade, or more fragrant bank; nor followed you with any other design than to partake of your conversation. Since then not suspicion but fondness has detected you, let me not lose the advantage of my discovery. I am equally weary of confinement with yourself, and not less desirous of knowing what is done or suffered in the world. Permit me to fly with you from this tasteless tranquility, which will yet grow more loathsome when you have left me. You may deny me to accompany you, but cannot hinder me from following."

The prince, who loved Nekayah above his other sisters, had no inclination to refuse her request, and grieved that he had lost an opportunity of showing his confidence by a voluntary communication. It was therefore agreed that she should leave the valley with them; and that, in the mean time, she should watch, lest any other straggler should, by chance or curiosity, follow them to the mountain.

At length their labor was at an end; they saw light beyond the prominence, and, issuing to the top of the mountain, beheld the Nile, yet a narrow current, wandering beneath them.

The prince looked round with rapture, anticipated all the pleasures of travel, and in thought was already transported beyond his father's dominions. Imlac, though very joyful at his escape, had less expectation of pleasure in the world, which he had before tried, and of which he had been weary.

Rasselas was so much delighted with a wider horizon, that he could not soon be persuaded to return into the valley. He informed his sister that the way was open, and that nothing now remained but to prepare for their departure.

Chapter 15. The Prince and Princess Leave the Valley, and See Many Wonders

The prince and princess had jewels sufficient to make them rich whenever they came into a place of commerce, which, by Imlac's direction, they hid in their clothes, and, on the night of the next full moon, all left the valley. The princess was followed only by a single favorite, who did not know whither she was going.

They clambered through the cavity, and began to go down on the other side. The princess and her maid turned their eyes towards every part, and, seeing nothing to bound their prospect, considered themselves as in danger of being lost in a dreary vacuity. They stopped and trembled. "I am almost afraid," said the princess, "to begin a journey of which I cannot perceive an end, and to venture into this immense plain where I may be approached on every side by men whom I never saw." The prince felt nearly the same emotions, though he thought it more manly to conceal them.

Imlac smiled at their terrors, and encouraged them to proceed; but the princess continued irresolute till she had been imperceptibly drawn forward too far to return.

In the morning they found some shepherds in the field, who set milk and fruits before them. The princess wondered that she did not see a palace ready for her reception, and a table spread with delicacies; but, being faint and hungry, she drank the milk and ate the fruits, and thought them of a higher flavor than the products of the valley.

They traveled forward by easy journeys, being all unaccustomed to toil or difficulty, and knowing, that though they might be missed, they could not be pursued. In a few days they came into a more populous region, where Imlac was diverted with the admiration which his companions expressed at the diversity of manners, stations and employments.

Their dress was such as might not bring upon them the suspicion of having any thing to conceal, yet the prince, wherever he came, expected to be obeyed, and the princess was frightened, because those that came into her presence did not prostrate themselves before her. Imlac was forced to observe them with great vigilance, lest they should betray their rank by their unusual behavior, and detained them several weeks in the first village to accustom them to the sight of common mortals.

By degrees the royal wanderers were taught to understand that they had for a time laid aside their dignity, and were to expect only such regard as liberality and courtesy could procure. And Imlac, having, by many admonitions, prepared them to endure the tumults of a port, and the ruggedness of the commercial race, brought them down to the seacoast.

The prince and his sister, to whom every thing was new, were gratified equally at all places, and therefore remained for some months at the port without any inclination to pass further. Imlac was content with their stay, because he did not think it safe to expose them, unpracticed in the world, to the hazards of a foreign country.

At last he began to fear lest they should be discovered, and proposed to fix a day for their departure. They had no pretensions to judge for themselves, and referred the whole scheme to his direction. He therefore took passage in a ship to Suez; and, when the time came, with great difficulty prevailed on the princess to enter the vessel. They had a quick and prosperous voyage, and from Suez traveled by land to Cairo.

Chapter 16. They Enter Cairo, and Find Every Man Happy

As they approached the city, which filled the strangers with astonishment, "This," said Imlac to the prince, "is the place where travelers and merchants assemble from all the corners of the earth. You will here find men of every character and every occupation. Commerce is here honorable. I will act as a merchant, and you shall live as strangers, who have no other end of travel than curiosity. It will soon be observed that we are rich; our reputation will procure us access to all whom we shall desire to know; you will see all the conditions of humanity, and enable yourself at leisure to make your choice of life."

They now entered the town, stunned by the noise, and offended by the crowds. Instruction had not yet so prevailed over habit, but that they wondered to see themselves pass undistinguished along the street, and met by the lowest of the people without reverence or notice. The princess could not at first bear the thought of being leveled with the vulgar,<sup>7</sup> and for some days continued in her chamber, where she was served by her favorite, Pekuah, as in the palace of the valley.

Imlac, who understood traffic,<sup>8</sup> sold part of the jewels the next day, and hired a house, which he adorned with such magnificence that he was immediately considered as a merchant of great wealth. His politeness attracted many acquaintance, and his generosity made him courted by many dependents. His table was crowded by men of every nation, who all admired his knowledge, and solicited his favor. His companions, not being able to mix in the conversation, could make no discovery<sup>9</sup> of their ignorance or surprise, and were gradually initiated in the world as they gained knowledge of the language.

7. Ordinary people.

8. Commerce.

9. Exposure.

The prince had, by frequent lectures, been taught the use and nature of money; but the ladies could not for a long time comprehend what the merchants did with small pieces of gold and silver, or why things of so little use should be received as equivalent to the necessaries of life.

They studied the language two years, while Imlac was preparing to set before them the various ranks and conditions of mankind. He grew acquainted with all who had anything uncommon in their fortune or conduct. He frequented the voluptuous and the frugal, the idle and the busy, the merchants and the men of learning.

The prince being now able to converse with fluency, and having learned the caution necessary to be observed in his intercourse with strangers, began to accompany Imlac to places of resort, and to enter into all assemblies, that he might make his choice of life.

For some time he thought choice needless, because all appeared to him equally happy. Wherever he went he met gaiety and kindness, and heard the song of joy or the laugh of carelessness. He began to believe that the world overflowed with universal plenty, and that nothing was withheld either from want or merit; that every hand showered liberality, and every heart melted with benevolence: "And who then," says he, "will be suffered to be wretched?"

Imlac permitted the pleasing delusion, and was unwilling to crush the hope of inexperience, till one day, having sat awhile silent, "I know not," said the prince, "what can be the reason that I am more unhappy than any of our friends. I see them perpetually and unalterably cheerful, but feel my own mind restless and uneasy. I am unsatisfied with those pleasures which I seem most to court; I live in the crowds of jollity, not so much to enjoy company as to shun myself, and am only loud and merry to conceal my sadness."

"Every man," said Imlac, "may, by examining his own mind, guess what passes in the minds of others; when you feel that your own gaiety is counterfeit, it may justly lead you to suspect that of your companions not to be sincere. Envy is commonly reciprocal. We are long before we are convinced that happiness is never to be found, and each believes it possessed by others, to keep alive the hope of obtaining it for himself. In the assembly where you passed the last night, there appeared such sprightliness of air, and volatility of fancy, as might have suited beings of an higher order, formed to inhabit serener regions, inaccessible to care or sorrow; yet, believe me, prince, there was not one who did not dread the moment when solitude should deliver him to the tyranny of reflection."

"This," said the prince, "may be true of others, since it is true of me; yet, whatever be the general infelicity of man, one condition is more happy than another, and wisdom surely directs us to take the least evil in the choice of life."

"The causes of good and evil," answered Imlac, "are so various and uncertain, so often entangled with each other, so diversified by various relations, and so much subject to accidents which cannot be foreseen, that he who would fix his condition upon incontestable reasons of preference must live and die inquiring and deliberating."

"But, surely," said Rasselas, "the wise men, to whom we listen with reverence and wonder, chose that mode of life for themselves which they thought most likely to make them happy."

"Very few," said the poet, "live by choice. Every man is placed in his present condition by causes which acted without his foresight, and with which he did not always willingly cooperate; and therefore you will rarely meet one who does not think the lot of his neighbor better than his own."

"I am pleased to think," said the prince, "that my birth has given me at least one advantage over others, by enabling me to determine for myself. I have here the world before me. I will review it at leisure; surely happiness is somewhere to be found."

Chapter 17. The Prince Associates with Young Men of Spirit and Gaiety

Rasselas rose next day, and resolved to begin his experiments upon life. "Youth," cried he, "is the time of gladness: I will join myself to the young men, whose only business is to gratify their desires, and whose time is all spent in a succession of enjoyments."

To such societies he was readily admitted, but a few days brought him back weary and disgusted. Their mirth was without images,<sup>1</sup> their laughter without motive; their pleasures were gross and sensual, in which the mind had no part; their conduct was at once wild and mean; they laughed at order and at law, but the frown of power dejected, and the eye of wisdom abashed them.

The prince soon concluded, that he should never be happy in a course of life of which he was ashamed. He thought it unsuitable to a reasonable being to act without a plan, and to be sad or cheerful only by chance. "Happiness," said he, "must be something solid and permanent, without fear and without uncertainty."

But his young companions had gained so much of his regard by their frankness and courtesy, that he could not leave them without warning and remonstrance. "My friends," said he, "I have seriously considered our manners and our prospects, and find that we have mistaken our own interest. The first years of man must make provision for the last. He that never thinks never can be wise. Perpetual levity must end in ignorance; and intemperance, though it may fire the spirits for an hour, will make life short or miserable. Let us consider that youth is of no long duration, and that in maturer age, when the enchantments of fancy shall cease, and phantoms of delight dance no more about us, we shall have no comforts but the esteem of wise men, and the means of doing good. Let us, therefore, stop, while to stop is in our power: let us live as men who are sometime to grow old, and to whom it will be the most dreadful of all evils not to count their past years but by follies, and to be reminded of their former luxuriance of health only by the maladies which riot has produced."

They stared a while in silence one upon another, and, at last, drove him away by a general chorus of continued laughter.

The consciousness that his sentiments were just, and his intentions kind, was scarcely sufficient to support him against the horror of derision. But he recovered his tranquillity, and pursued his search.

Chapter 18. The Prince Finds a Wise and Happy Man

As he was one day walking in the street, he saw a spacious building which all were, by the open doors, invited to enter: he followed the stream of people, and found it a hall or school of declamation, in which professors read lectures to their auditory.<sup>2</sup> He fixed his eye upon a sage raised above the rest, who discoursed with great energy on the government of the passions. His look was venerable, his action graceful, his pronunciation clear, and his diction elegant. He showed with great strength of sentiment and variety of illustration that human nature is degraded and debased, when the lower faculties predominate over the higher; that when fancy, the parent of passion, usurps the dominion of the mind, nothing ensues but the natural effect of unlawful government, perturbation, and confusion; that she betrays the fortresses of the intellect to rebels, and excites her children to sedition against reason, their lawful sovereign. He compared reason to the sun, of which the light is constant, uniform and lasting; and fancy to a meteor, of bright but transitory luster, irregular in its motion, and delusive in its direction.

He then communicated the various precepts given from time to time for the conquest of passion, and displayed the happiness of those who had obtained the important victory, after which man is no longer the slave of fear, nor the fool of hope; is no more emaciated by envy, inflamed by anger, emasculated by tenderness, or depressed by grief; but walks on calmly through the tumults or the privacies of life, as the sun pursues alike his course through the calm or the stormy sky.

He enumerated many examples of heroes immovable by pain or pleasure, who looked with indifference on those modes or accidents to which the vulgar give the names of good and evil. He exhorted his hearers to lay aside their prejudices, and arm themselves against the shafts of malice or misfortune, by invulnerable patience; concluding that this state only was happiness, and that this happiness was in everyone's power.

Rasselas listened to him with the veneration due to the instructions of a superior being, and, waiting for him at the door, humbly implored the liberty of visiting so great a master of true wisdom. The lecturer hesitated a moment, when Rasselas put a purse of gold into his hand, which he received with a mixture of joy and wonder.

"I have found," said the prince at his return to Imlac, "a man who can teach all that is necessary to be known; who, from the unshaken throne of rational fortitude, looks down on the scenes of life changing beneath him. He speaks, and attention watches his lips. He reasons, and conviction closes his periods.<sup>3</sup> This man shall be my future guide; I will learn his doctrines, and imitate his life."

"Be not too hasty," said Imlac, "to trust or to admire the teachers of morality: they discourse like angels, but they live like men."

Rasselas, who could not conceive how any man could reason so forcibly without feeling the cogency of his own arguments, paid his visit in a few days, and was denied admission. He had now learned the power of money, and made his way by a piece of gold to the inner apartment, where he found the philosopher in a room half darkened, with his eyes misty and his face pale. "Sir," said he, "you are come at a time when all human friendship is useless; what I suffer cannot be remedied, what I have lost cannot be supplied. My daughter, my only daughter, from whose tenderness I expected all the comforts of my age, died last night of a fever. My views, my purposes, my hopes are at an end; I am now a lonely being, disunited from society."

"Sir," said the prince, "mortality is an event by which a wise man can never be surprised; we know that death is always near, and it should therefore always be expected." "Young man," answered the philosopher, "you speak like one that has never felt the pangs of separation." "Have you then forgot the precepts," said Rasselas, "which you so powerfully enforced? Has wisdom no strength to arm the heart against calamity? Consider that external things are naturally variable, but truth and reason are always the same." "What comfort," said the mourner, "can truth and reason afford me? Of what effect are they now, but to tell me that my daughter will not be restored?"

The prince, whose humanity would not suffer him to insult misery with reproof, went away, convinced of the emptiness of rhetorical sound, and the inefficacy of polished periods and studied sentences.<sup>4</sup>

Chapter 19. A Glimpse of Pastoral Life

He was still eager upon the same inquiry; and having heard of a hermit that lived near the lowest cataract of the Nile, and filled the whole country with the fame of his sanctity, resolved to visit his retreat, and inquire whether that felicity which public life could not afford was to be found in solitude; and whether a man whose age and virtue made him venerable could teach any peculiar art of shunning evils, or enduring them.

Imlac and the princess agreed to accompany him, and, after the necessary preparations, they began their journey. Their way lay through fields, where shepherds tended their flocks and the lambs were playing upon the pasture. "This," said the poet, "is the life which has been often celebrated for its innocence and quiet; let us pass the heat of the day among the shepherds' tents, and know whether all our searches are not to terminate in pastoral simplicity."

The proposal pleased them, and they induced the shepherds, by small presents and familiar questions, to tell their opinion of their own state. They were so rude and ignorant, so little able to compare the good with the evil of the occupation, and so indistinct in their narratives and descriptions, that very little could be learned from them. But it was evident that their hearts were cankered with discontent; that they considered themselves as condemned to labor for the luxury of the rich, and looked up with stupid malevolence toward those that were placed above them.

The princess pronounced with vehemence that she would never suffer these envious savages to be her companions, and that she should not soon be desirous of seeing any more specimens of rustic happiness; but could not believe that all the accounts of primeval pleasures were fabulous, and was yet in doubt whether life had anything that could be justly preferred to the placid gratifications of fields and woods. She hoped that the time would come, when, with a few virtuous and elegant companions, she could gather flowers planted by her own hand, fondle the lambs of her own ewe, and listen, without care, among brooks and breezes, to one of her maidens reading in the shade.

Chapter 20. The Danger of Prosperity

On the next day they continued their journey, till the heat compelled them to look round for shelter. At a small distance they saw a thick wood, which they no sooner entered than they perceived that they were approaching the habitations of men. The shrubs were diligently cut away to open walks where the shades were darkest; the boughs of opposite trees were artificially interwoven; seats of flowery turf were raised in vacant spaces, and a rivulet, that wanted along the side of a winding path, had its banks sometimes opened into small basins, and its stream sometimes obstructed by little mounds of stone heaped together to increase its murmurs.

They passed slowly through the wood, delighted with such unexpected accommodations, and entertained each other with conjecturing what, or who, he could be, that, in those rude and unfrequented regions, had leisure and art for such harmless luxury.

As they advanced, they heard the sound of music, and saw youths and virgins dancing in the grove; and, going still further, beheld a stately palace built upon a hill surrounded with woods. The laws of eastern hospitality allowed them to enter, and the master welcomed them like a man liberal and wealthy.

He was skilful enough in appearances soon to discern that they were no common guests, and spread his table with magnificence. The eloquence of Imlac caught his attention, and the lofty courtesy of the princess excited his respect. When they offered to depart he entreated their stay, and was the next day still more unwilling to dismiss them than before. They were easily persuaded to stop, and civility grew up in time to freedom and confidence.

The prince now saw all the domestics cheerful, and all the face of nature smiling round the place, and could not forbear to hope that he should find here what he was seeking; but when he was congratulating the master upon his possessions, he answered with a sigh, "My condition has indeed the appearance of happiness, but appearances are delusive. My prosperity puts my life in danger; the Bassa<sup>5</sup> of Egypt is my enemy, incensed only by my wealth and popularity. I have been hitherto protected against him by the princes of the country; but, as the favor of the great is uncertain, I know not how soon my defenders may be persuaded to share the plunder with the Bassa. I have sent my treasures into a distant country, and, upon the first alarm, am prepared to follow them. Then will my enemies riot in my mansion, and enjoy the gardens which I have planted."

They all joined in lamenting his danger, and deprecating his exile; and the princess was so much disturbed with the tumult of grief and indignation, that she retired to her apartment. They continued with their kind inviter a few days longer, and then went forward to find the hermit.

Chapter 21. The Happiness of Solitude. The Hermit's History

They came on the third day, by the direction of the peasants, to the hermit's cell: it was a cavern in the side of a mountain, over-shadowed with palm-trees; at such a distance from the cataract, that nothing more was heard than a gentle uniform murmur, such as composed the mind to pensive meditation, especially when it was assisted by the wind whistling among the branches. The first rude essay of nature had been so much improved by human labor, that the cave contained several apartments, appropriated to different uses, and often afforded lodging to travelers, whom darkness or tempests happened to overtake.

The hermit sat on a bench at the door, to enjoy the coolness of the evening. On one side lay a book with pens and papers, on the other mechanical instruments of various kinds. As they approached him unregarded, the princess observed that he had not the countenance of a man that had found, or could teach, the way to happiness.

They saluted him with great respect, which he repaid like a man not unaccustomed to the forms of courts. "My children," said he, "if you have lost your way, you shall be willingly supplied with such conveniencies for the night as this cavern will afford. I have all that nature requires, and you will not expect delicacies in a hermit's cell."

They thanked him, and, entering, were pleased with the neatness and regularity of the place. The hermit set flesh and wine before them, though he fed only upon fruits and water. His discourse was cheerful without levity, and pious without enthusiasm.<sup>6</sup> He soon gained the esteem of his guests, and the princess repented of her hasty censure.

At last Imlac began thus: "I do not now wonder that your reputation is so far extended; we have heard at Cairo of your wisdom, and came hither to implore your direction for this young man and maiden in the choice of life."

"To him that lives well," answered the hermit, "every form of life is good; nor can I give any other rule for choice, than to remove from all apparent evil."

"He will remove most certainly from evil," said the prince, "who shall devote himself to that solitude which you have recommended by your example."

"I have indeed lived fifteen years in solitude," said the hermit, "but have no desire that my example should gain any imitators. In my youth I professed arms, and was raised by degrees to the highest military rank. I have traversed wide countries at the head of my troops, and seen many battles and sieges. At last, being disgusted by the preferment of a younger officer, and feeling that my vigor was beginning to decay, I resolved to close my life in peace, having found the world full of snares, discord, and misery. I had once escaped from the pursuit of the enemy by the shelter of this cavern, and therefore chose it for my final residence. I employed artificers to form it into chambers, and stored it with all that I was likely to want.

"For some time after my retreat, I rejoiced like a tempest-beaten sailor at his entrance into the harbor, being delighted with the sudden change of the noise and hurry of war, to stillness and repose. When the pleasure of novelty went away, I employed my hours in examining the plants which grow in the valley, and the minerals which I collected from the rocks. But that inquiry is now grown tasteless and irksome. I have been for some time unsettled and distracted: my mind is disturbed with a thousand perplexities of doubt, and vanities of imagination, which hourly prevail upon me, because I have no opportunities of relaxation or diversion. I am sometimes ashamed to think that I could not secure myself from vice, but by retiring from the exercise of virtue, and begin to suspect that I was rather impelled by resentment, than led by devotion, into solitude. My fancy riots in scenes of folly, and I lament that I have lost so much, and have gained so little. In solitude, if I escape the example of bad men, I want likewise the counsel and conversation of the good. I have been long comparing the evils with the advantages of society, and resolve to return into the world tomorrow. The life of a solitary man will be certainly miserable, but not certainly devout."

They heard his resolution with surprise, but, after a short pause, offered to conduct him to Cairo. He dug up a considerable treasure which he had hid among the rocks, and accompanied them to the city, on which, as he approached it, he gazed with rapture.

Chapter 22. The Happiness of a Life Led According to Nature

Rasselas went often to an assembly of learned men, who met at stated times to unbend their minds and compare their opinions. Their manners were somewhat coarse, but their conversation was instructive, and their disputations acute, though sometimes too violent, and often continued till neither controvertist remembered upon what question they began. Some faults were almost general among them; everyone was desirous to dictate to the rest, and everyone was pleased to hear the genius or knowledge of another depreciated.

In this assembly Rasselas was relating his interview with the hermit, and the wonder with which he heard him censure a course of life which he had so deliberately chosen, and so laudably followed. The sentiments of the hearers were various. Some were of opinion that the folly of his choice had been justly punished by condemnation to perpetual perseverance. One of the youngest among them, with great vehemence, pronounced him an hypocrite. Some talked of the right of society to the labor of individuals, and considered retirement as a desertion of duty. Others readily allowed that there was a time when the claims of the public were satisfied, and when a man might properly sequester himself, to review his life and purify his heart.

One, who appeared more affected with the narrative than the rest, thought it likely that the hermit would in a few years go back to his retreat, and perhaps, if shame did not restrain, or death intercept him, return once more from his retreat into the world. "For the hope of happiness," said he, "is so strongly impressed that the longest experience is not able to efface it. Of the present state, whatever it be, we feel and are forced to confess the misery; yet when the same state is again at a distance, imagination paints it as desirable. But the time will surely come when desire will be no longer our torment, and no man shall be wretched but by his own fault."

"This," said a philosopher who had heard him with tokens of great impatience, "is the present condition of a wise man. The time is already come when none are wretched but by their own fault. Nothing is more idle than to inquire after happiness, which nature has kindly placed within our reach. The way to be happy is to live according to nature, in obedience to that universal and unalterable law with which every heart is originally impressed; which is not written on it by precept, but engraven by destiny, not instilled by education, but infused at our nativity. He that lives according to nature will suffer nothing from the delusions of hope, or importunities of desire; he will receive and reject with equability of temper, and act or suffer as the reason of things shall alternately prescribe. Other men may amuse themselves with subtle definitions, or intricate ratiocination. Let them learn to be wise by easier means; let them observe the hind of the forest, and the linnet of the grove; let them consider the life of animals, whose motions are regulated by instinct; they obey their guide, and are happy. Let us therefore, at length, cease to dispute, and learn to live; throw away the encumbrance of precepts, which they who utter them with so much pride and pomp do not understand, and carry with us this simple and intelligible maxim, that deviation from nature is deviation from happiness."

When he had spoken, he looked round him with a placid air, and enjoyed the consciousness of his own beneficence. "Sir," said the prince with great modesty, "as I, like all the rest of mankind, am desirous of felicity, my closest attention has been fixed upon your discourse. I doubt not the truth of a position which a man so learned has so confidently advanced. Let me only know what it is to live according to nature."

"When I find young men so humble and so docile," said the philosopher, "I can deny them no information which my studies have enabled me to afford. To live according to nature, is to act always with due regard to the fitness arising from the relations and qualities of causes and effects; to concur with the great and unchangeable scheme of universal felicity; to co-operate with the general disposition and tendency of the present system of things."

The prince soon found that this was one of the sages whom he should understand less as he heard him longer. He therefore bowed and was silent; and the philosopher, supposing him satisfied, and the rest vanquished, rose up and departed with the air of a man that had co-operated with the present system.

Chapter 23. The Prince and his Sister Divide between Them the Work of Observation

Rasselas returned home full of reflections, doubtful how to direct his future steps. Of the way to happiness he found the learned and simple equally ignorant; but, as he was yet young, he flattered himself that he had time remaining for more experiments, and further inquiries. He communicated to Imlac his observations and his doubts, but was answered by him with new doubts, and remarks that gave him no comfort. He therefore discoursed more frequently and freely with his sister, who had yet the same hope with himself, and always assisted him to give some reason why, though he had been hitherto frustrated, he might succeed at last.

"We have hitherto," said she, "known but little of the world: we have never yet been either great or mean. In our own country, though we had royalty, we had no power, and in this we have not yet seen the private recesses of domestic peace. Imlac favors not our search, lest we should in time find him mistaken. We will divide the task between us: you shall try what is to be found in the splendor of courts, and I will range the shades of humbler life. Perhaps command and authority may be the supreme blessings, as they afford most opportunities of doing good: or, perhaps, what this world can give may be found in the modest habitations of middle fortune; too low for great designs, and too high for penury and distress."

Chapter 24. The Prince Examines the Happiness of High Stations

Rasselas applauded the design, and appeared next day with a splendid retinue at the court of the Bassa. He was soon distinguished for his magnificence, and admitted, as a prince whose curiosity had brought him from distant countries, to an intimacy with the great officers, and frequent conversation with the Bassa himself.

He was at first inclined to believe, that the man must be pleased with his own condition, whom all approached with reverence, and heard with obedience, and who had the power to extend his edicts to a whole kingdom. "There can be no pleasure," said he, "equal to that of feeling at once the joy of thousands all made happy by wise administration. Yet, since, by the law of subordination, this sublime delight can be in one nation but the lot of one, it is surely reasonable to think that there is some satisfaction more popular<sup>7</sup> and accessible, and that millions can hardly be subjected to the will of a single man, only to fill his particular breast with incommunicable content."

These thoughts were often in his mind, and he found no solution of the difficulty. But as presents and civilities gained him more familiarity, he found that almost every man who stood high in employment hated all the rest, and was hated by them, and that their lives were a continual succession of plots and detections, stratagems and escapes, faction and treachery. Many of those, who surrounded the Bassa, were sent only to watch and report his conduct; every tongue was muttering censure and every eye was searching for a fault.

At last the letters of revocation arrived, the Bassa was carried in chains to Constantinople, and his name was mentioned no more.

"What are we now to think of the prerogatives of power," said Rasselas to his sister; "is it without any efficacy to good? or, is the subordinate degree only dangerous, and the supreme safe and glorious? Is the Sultan the only happy man in his dominions? or, is the Sultan himself subject to the torments of suspicion, and the dread of enemies?"

In a short time the second Bassa was deposed. The Sultan, that had advanced him, was murdered by the Janisaries,<sup>8</sup> and his successor had other views and different favorites.

Chapter 25. The Princess Pursues Her Inquiry with More Diligence than Success

The princess, in the mean time, insinuated herself into many families; for there are few doors, through which liberality, joined with good humor, cannot find its way. The daughters of many houses were airy<sup>9</sup> and cheerful, but Nekayah had been too long accustomed to the conversation of Imlac and her brother to be much pleased with childish levity and prattle which had no meaning. She found their thoughts narrow, their wishes low, and their merriment often artificial. Their pleasures, poor as they were, could not be preserved pure, but were embittered by petty competitions and worthless emulation. They were always jealous of the beauty of each other; of a quality to which solicitude can add nothing, and from which detraction can take nothing away. Many were in love with triflers like themselves, and many fancied that they were in love when in truth they were only idle. Their affection was seldom fixed on sense or virtue, and therefore seldom ended but in vexation. Their grief, however, like their joy, was transient; everything floated in their mind unconnected with the past or future, so that one desire easily gave way to another, as a second stone cast into the water effaces and confounds the circles of the first.

With these girls she played as with inoffensive animals, and found them proud of her countenance,<sup>1</sup> and weary of her company.

But her purpose was to examine more deeply, and her affability easily persuaded the hearts that were swelling with sorrow to discharge their secrets in her ear: and those whom hope flattered, or prosperity delighted, often courted her to partake their pleasures.

The princess and her brother commonly met in the evening in a private summer-house on the bank of the Nile, and related to each other the occurrences of the day. As they were sitting together, the princess cast her eyes upon the river that flowed before her. "Answer," said she, "great father of waters, thou that rollest thy floods through eighty nations, to the invocations of the daughter of thy native land. Tell me if thou waterest, through all thy course, a single habitation from which thou dost not hear the murmurs of complaint?"

"You are then," said Rasselas, "not more successful in private houses than I have been in courts." "I have, since the last partition of our provinces,"<sup>2</sup> said the princess, "enabled myself to enter familiarly into many families, where there was the fairest show of prosperity and peace, and know not one house that is not haunted by some fury that destroys its quiet.

"I did not seek ease among the poor, because I concluded that there it could not be found. But I saw many poor whom I had supposed to live in affluence. Poverty has, in large cities, very different appearances: it is often concealed in splendor, and often in extravagance. It is the care of a very great part of mankind to conceal their indigence from the rest: they support themselves by temporary expedients, and every day is lost in contriving for the morrow.

"This, however, was an evil, which, though frequent, I saw with less pain, because I could relieve it. Yet some have refused my bounties; more offended with my quickness to detect their wants, than pleased with my readiness to succor them: and others, whose exigencies compelled them to admit my kindness, have never been able to forgive their benefactress. Many, however, have been sincerely grateful without the ostentation of gratitude, or the hope of other favors."

Chapter 26. The Princess Continues Her Remarks upon Private Life

Nekayah, perceiving her brother's attention fixed, proceeded in her narrative.

"In families where there is or is not poverty, there is commonly discord. If a kingdom be, as Imlac tells us, a great family, a family likewise is a little kingdom, torn with factions and exposed to revolutions. An unpracticed observer expects the love of parents and children to be constant and equal; but this kindness seldom continues beyond the years of infancy: in a short time the children become rivals to their parents. Benefits are allayed<sup>3</sup> by reproaches, and gratitude debased by envy.

"Parents and children seldom act in concert; each child endeavors to appropriate the esteem or fondness of the parents, and the parents, with yet less temptation, betray each other to their children. Thus, some place their confidence in the father, and some in the mother, and by degrees the house is filled with artifices and feuds.

"The opinions of children and parents, of the young and the old, are naturally opposite, by the contrary effects of hope and despondence, of expectation and experience, without crime or folly on either side. The colors of life in youth and age appear different, as the face of nature in spring and winter. And how can children credit the assertions of parents, which their own eyes show them to be false?

"Few parents act in such a manner as much to enforce their maxims by the credit of their lives. The old man trusts wholly to slow contrivance and gradual progression; the youth expects to force his way by genius, vigor, and precipitance. The old man pays regard to riches, and the youth reverences virtue. The old man deifies prudence; the youth commits himself to magnanimity and chance. The young man, who intends no ill, believes that none is intended, and therefore acts with openness and candor; but his father, having suffered the injuries of fraud, is impelled to suspect, and too often allured to practice it. Age looks with anger on the temerity of youth, and youth with contempt on the scrupulosity<sup>4</sup> of age. Thus parents and children, for the greatest part, live on to love less and less; and, if those whom nature has thus closely united are the torments of each other, where shall we look for tenderness and consolation?"

"Surely," said the prince, "you must have been unfortunate in your choice of acquaintance: I am unwilling to believe that the most tender of all relations is thus impeded in its effects by natural necessity."

"Domestic discord," answered she, "is not inevitably and fatally necessary, but yet is not easily avoided. We seldom see that a whole family is virtuous; the good and evil cannot well agree, and the evil can yet less agree with one another. Even the virtuous fall sometimes to variance, when their virtues are of different kinds, and tending to extremes. In general, those parents have most reverence who most deserve it; for he that lives well cannot be despised.

"Many other evils infest private life. Some are the slaves of servants whom they have trusted with their affairs. Some are kept in continual anxiety to the caprice of rich relations, whom they cannot please, and dare not offend. Some husbands are imperious, and some wives perverse; and, as it is always more easy to do evil than good, though the wisdom or virtue of one can very rarely make many happy, the folly or vice of one may often make many miserable."

"If such be the general effect of marriage," said the prince, "I shall for the future think it dangerous to connect my interest with that of another, lest I should be unhappy by my partner's fault."

"I have met," said the princess, "with many who live single for that reason; but I never found that their prudence ought to raise envy. They dream away their time without friendship, without fondness, and are driven to rid themselves of the day, for which they have no use, by childish amusements, or vicious delights. They act as beings under the constant sense of some known inferiority that fills their minds with rancor, and their tongues with censure. They are peevish at home, and malevolent abroad; and, as the outlaws of human nature, make it their business and their pleasure to disturb that society which debars them from its privileges. To live without feeling or exciting sympathy, to be fortunate without adding to the felicity of others, or afflicted without tasting the balm of pity, is a state more gloomy than solitude; it is not retreat but exclusion from mankind. Marriage has many pains, but celibacy has no pleasures."

"What then is to be done?" said Rasselas; "the more we inquire, the less we can resolve. Surely he is most likely to please himself that has no other inclination to regard."

4. "Fear of acting in any manner" (Johnson's Dictionary).

Chapter 27. Disquisition upon Greatness

The conversation had a short pause. The prince, having considered his sister's observations, told her, that she had surveyed life with prejudice, and supposed misery where she did not find it. "Your narrative," says he, "throws yet a darker gloom upon the prospects of futurity: the predictions of Imlac were but faint sketches of the evils painted by Nekayah. I have been lately convinced that quiet is not the daughter of grandeur, or of power: that her presence is not to be bought by wealth, nor enforced by conquest. It is evident, that as any man acts in a wider compass, he must be more exposed to opposition from enmity or miscarriage from chance; whoever has many to please or to govern, must use the ministry of many agents, some of whom will be wicked, and some ignorant; by some he will be misled, and by others betrayed. If he gratifies one he will offend another: those that are not favored will think themselves injured; and, since favors can be conferred but upon few, the greater number will be always discontented."

"The discontent," said the princess, "which is thus unreasonable, I hope that I shall always have spirit to despise, and you, power to repress."

"Discontent," answered Rasselas, "will not always be without reason under the most just or vigilant administration of public affairs. None, however attentive, can always discover that merit which indigence or faction may happen to obscure; and none, however powerful, can always reward it. Yet, he that sees inferior desert<sup>5</sup> advanced above him, will naturally impute that preference to partiality or caprice; and, indeed, it can scarcely be hoped that any man, however magnanimous by nature, or exalted by condition, will be able to persist for ever in fixed and inexorable justice of distribution: he will sometimes indulge his own affections, and sometimes those of his favorites; he will permit some to please him who can never serve him; he will discover in those whom he loves qualities which in reality they do not possess; and to those, from whom he receives pleasure, he will in his turn endeavor to give it. Thus will recommendations sometimes prevail which were purchased by money, or by the more destructive bribery of flattery and servility.

"He that has much to do will do something wrong, and of that wrong must suffer the consequences; and, if it were possible that he should always act rightly, yet when such numbers are to judge of his conduct, the bad will censure and obstruct him by malevolence, and the good sometimes by mistake.

"The highest stations cannot therefore hope to be the abodes of happiness, which I would willingly believe to have fled from thrones and palaces to seats of humble privacy and placid obscurity. For what can hinder the satisfaction, or intercept the expectations, of him whose abilities are adequate to his employments, who sees with his own eyes the whole circuit of his influence, who chooses by his own knowledge all whom he trusts, and whom none are tempted to deceive by hope or fear? Surely he has nothing to do but to love and to be loved, to be virtuous and to be happy."

"Whether perfect happiness would be procured by perfect goodness," said Nekayah, "this world will never afford an opportunity of deciding. But this, at least, may be maintained, that we do not always find visible happiness in proportion to visible virtue. All natural and almost all political evils, are incident alike to the bad and good: they are confounded in the misery of a famine, and not much distinguished in the fury of a faction; they sink together in a tempest,

5. Merit; one deserving reward.

and are driven together from their country by invaders. All that virtue can afford is quietness of conscience, a steady prospect of a happier state; this may enable us to endure calamity with patience; but remember that patience must suppose pain."

Chapter 28. Rasselas and Nelmyah Continue Their Conversation

"Dear princess," said Rasselas, "you fall into the common errors of exaggeratory declamation, by producing, in a familiar disquisition,<sup>6</sup> examples of national calamities, and scenes of extensive misery, which are found in books rather than in the world, and which, as they are horrid, are ordained to be rare. Let us not imagine evils which we do not feel, nor injure life by misrepresentations. I cannot bear that querulous eloquence which threatens every city with a siege like that of Jerusalem,<sup>7</sup> that makes famine attend on every flight of locusts, and suspends pestilence on the wing of every blast that issues from the south.

"On necessary and inevitable evils, which overwhelm kingdoms at once, all disputation is vain: when they happen they must be endured. But it is evident, that these bursts of universal distress are more dreaded than felt: thousands and ten thousands flourish in youth, and wither in age, without the knowledge of any other than domestic evils, and share the same pleasures and vexations whether their kings are mild or cruel, whether the armies of their country pursue their enemies, or retreat before them. While courts are disturbed with intestine<sup>8</sup> competitions, and ambassadors are negotiating in foreign countries, the smith still plies his anvil, and the husbandman drives his plow forward; the necessaries of life are required and obtained, and the successive business of the seasons continues to make its wonted revolutions.

"Let us cease to consider what, perhaps, may never happen, and what, when it shall happen, will laugh at human speculation. We will not endeavor to modify the motions of the elements, or to fix the destiny of kingdoms. It is our business to consider what beings like us may perform; each laboring for his own happiness, by promoting within his circle, however narrow, the happiness of others.

"Marriage is evidently the dictate of nature; men and women were made to be companions of each other, and therefore I cannot be persuaded but that marriage is one of the means of happiness."

"I know not," said the princess, "whether marriage be more than one of the innumerable modes of human misery. When I see and reckon the various forms of connubial infelicity, the unexpected causes of lasting discord, the diversities of temper, the oppositions of opinion, the rude collisions of contrary desire where both are urged by violent impulses, the obstinate contests of disagreeing virtues, where both are supported by consciousness of good intention, I am sometimes disposed to think with the severer casuists of most nations, that marriage is rather permitted than approved, and that none, but by the instigation of a passion too much indulged, entangle themselves with indissoluble compacts."

"You seem to forget," replied Rasselas, "that you have, even now, represented celibacy as less happy than marriage. Both conditions may be bad, but they cannot both be worst. Thus it happens when wrong opinions are entertained, that they mutually destroy each other, and leave the mind open to truth."

"I did not expect," answered the princess, "to hear that imputed to falsehood which is the consequence only of frailty. To the mind, as to the eye, it is difficult to compare with exactness objects vast in their extent, and various in their parts. Where we see or conceive the whole at once we readily note the discriminations and decide the preference: but of two systems, of which neither can be surveyed by any human being in its full compass of magnitude and multiplicity of complication, where is the wonder, that judging of the whole by parts, I am alternately affected by one and the other as either presses on my memory or fancy? We differ from ourselves just as we differ from each other, when we see only part of the question, as in the multifarious relations of politics and morality: but when we perceive the whole at once, as in numerical computations, all agree in one judgment, and none ever varies his opinion."

"Let us not add," said the prince, "to the other evils of life, the bitterness of controversy, nor endeavor to vie with each other in subtleties of argument. We are employed in a search, of which both are equally to enjoy the success, or suffer by the miscarriage. It is therefore fit that we assist each other. You surely conclude too hastily from the infelicity of marriage against its institution; will not the misery of life prove equally that life cannot be the gift of heaven? The world must be peopled by marriage, or peopled without it."

"How the world is to be peopled," returned Nekayah, "is not my care, and needs not be yours. I see no danger that the present generation should omit to leave successors behind them: we are not now inquiring for the world, but for ourselves."

"The good of the whole," says Rasselas, "is the same with the good of all its parts. If marriage be best for mankind it must be evidently best for individuals, or a permanent and necessary duty must be the cause of evil, and some must be inevitably sacrificed to the convenience of others. In the estimate which you have made of the two states, it appears that the incommodities of a single life are, in a great measure, necessary and certain, but those of the conjugal state accidental and avoidable.

"I cannot forbear to flatter myself that prudence and benevolence will make marriage happy. The general folly of mankind is the cause of general complaint. What can be expected but disappointment and repentance from a choice made in the immaturity of youth, in the ardor of desire, without judgment, without foresight, without inquiry after conformity of opinions, similarity of manners, rectitude of judgment, or purity of sentiment.

"Such is the common process of marriage. A youth and maiden meeting by chance, or brought together by artifice, exchange glances, reciprocate civilities, go home, and dream of one another. Having little to divert attention, or diversify thought, they find themselves uneasy when they are apart, and therefore conclude that they shall be happy together. They marry, and discover what nothing but voluntary blindness had before concealed; they wear out life in altercations, and charge nature with cruelty.

"From those early marriages proceeds likewise the rivalry of parents and children: the son is eager to enjoy the world before the father is willing to forsake it, and there is hardly room at once for two generations. The daughter begins to bloom before the mother can be content to fade, and neither can forbear to wish for the absence of the other.

"Surely all these evils may be avoided by that deliberation and delay which prudence prescribes to irrevocable choice. In the variety and jollity of youthful pleasures life may be well enough supported without the help of a partner. Longer time will increase experience, and wider views will allow better opportunities of inquiry and selection: one advantage, at least, will be certain; the parents will be visibly older than their children."

"What reason cannot collect," said Nekayah, "and what experiment has not yet taught, can be known only from the report of others. I have been told that late marriages are not eminently happy. This is a question too important to be neglected, and I have often proposed it to those, whose accuracy of remark, and comprehensiveness of knowledge, made their suffrages<sup>9</sup> worthy of regard. They have generally determined that it is dangerous for a man and woman to suspend their fate upon each other, at a time when opinions are fixed, and habits are established; when friendships have been contracted on both sides, when life has been planned into method, and the mind has long enjoyed the contemplation of its own prospects.

"It is scarcely possible that two traveling through the world under the conduct of chance should have been both directed to the same path, and it will not often happen that either will quit the track which custom has made pleasing. When the desultory levity of youth has settled into regularity, it is soon succeeded by pride ashamed to yield, or obstinacy delighting to contend. And even though mutual esteem produces mutual desire to please, time itself, as it modifies unchangeably the external mien, determines likewise the direction of the passions, and gives an inflexible rigidity to the manners. Long customs are not easily broken: he that attempts to change the course of his own life very often labors in vain; and how shall we do that for others which we are seldom able to do for ourselves?"

"But surely," interposed the prince, "you suppose the chief motive of choice forgotten or neglected. Whenever I shall seek a wife, it shall be my first question, whether she be willing to be led by reason?"

"Thus it is," said Nekayah, "that philosophers are deceived. There are a thousand familiar<sup>1</sup> disputes which reason never can decide; questions that elude investigation, and make logic ridiculous; cases where something must be done, and where little can be said. Consider the state of mankind, and inquire how few can be supposed to act upon any occasions, whether small or great, with all the reasons of action present to their minds. Wretched would be the pair above all names of wretchedness, who should be doomed to adjust by reason every morning all the minute detail of a domestic day.

"Those who marry at an advanced age will probably escape the encroachments of their children; but, in diminution of this advantage, they will be likely to leave them, ignorant and helpless, to a guardian's mercy: or, if that should not happen, they must at least go out of the world before they see those whom they love best either wise or great.

"From their children, if they have less to fear, they have less also to hope, and they lose, without equivalent, the joys of early love, and the convenience of uniting with manners pliant and minds susceptible of new impressions, which might wear away their dissimilitudes by long cohabitation, as soft bodies, by continual attrition, conform their surfaces to each other.

"I believe it will be found that those who marry late are best pleased with their children, and those who marry early with their partners."

"The union of these two affections," said Rasselas, "would produce all that could be wished. Perhaps there is a time when marriage might unite them, a time neither too early for the father, nor too late for the husband."

"Every hour," answered the princess, "confirms my prejudice in favor of the position so often uttered by the mouth of Imlac, 'That nature sets her gifts on the right hand and on the left.' Those conditions, which flatter hope and attract desire, are so constituted that, as we approach one, we recede from another. There are goods so opposed that we cannot seize both, but, by too much prudence, may pass between them at too great a distance to reach either. This is often the fate of long consideration; he does nothing who endeavors to do more than is allowed to humanity. Flatter not yourself with contrarieties of pleasure. Of the blessings set before you make your choice, and be content. No man can taste the fruits of autumn, while he is delighting his scent with the flowers of the spring: no man can, at the same time, fill his cup from the source and from the mouth of the Nile."

Chapter 30. Imlac Enters, and Changes the Conversation

Here Imlac entered, and interrupted them. "Imlac," said Rasselas, "I have been told from the princess the dismal history of private life, and am almost discouraged from further search."

"It seems to me," said Imlac, "that while you are making the choice of life, you neglect to live. You wander about a single city, which, however large and diversified, can now afford few novelties, and forget that you are in a country, famous among the earliest monarchies for the power and wisdom of its inhabitants; a country where the sciences first dawned that illuminate the world, and beyond which the arts cannot be traced of civil society or domestic life.

"The old Egyptians have left behind them monuments of industry and power before which all European magnificence is confessed to fade away. The ruins of their architecture are the schools of modern builders, and from the wonders which time has spared we may conjecture, though uncertainly, what it has destroyed."

"My curiosity," said Rasselas, "does not very strongly lead me to survey piles of stone, or mounds of earth; my business is with man. I came hither not to measure fragments of temples, or trace choked aqueducts, but to look upon the various scenes of the present world."

"The things that are now before us," said the princess, "require attention, and deserve it. What have I to do with the heroes or the monuments of ancient times? with times which never can return, and heroes, whose form of life was different from all that the present condition of mankind requires or allows."

"To know anything," returned the poet, "we must know its effects; to see men we must see their works, that we may learn what reason has dictated, or passion has incited, and find what are the most powerful motives of action. To judge rightly of the present we must oppose it to the past; for all judgment is comparative, and of the future nothing can be known. The truth is, that no mind is much employed upon the present: recollection and anticipation fill up almost all our moments. Our passions are joy and grief, love and hatred, hope and fear. Of joy and grief the past is the object, and the future of hope and fear; even love and hatred respect the past, for the cause must have been before the effect.

"The present state of things is the consequence of the former, and it is natural to inquire what were the sources of the good that we enjoy, or of the evil that we suffer. If we act only for ourselves, to neglect the study of history is not prudent: if we are entrusted with the care of others, it is not just. Ignorance, when it is voluntary, is criminal; and he may properly be charged with evil who refused to learn how he might prevent it.

"There is no part of history so generally useful as that which relates the progress of the human mind, the gradual improvement of reason, the successive advances of science, the vicissitudes of learning and ignorance, which are the light and darkness of thinking beings, the extinction and resuscitation of arts, and all the revolutions of the intellectual world. If accounts of battles and invasions are peculiarly the business of princes, the useful or elegant arts are not to be neglected; those who have kingdoms to govern, have understandings to cultivate.

"Example is always more efficacious than precept. A soldier is formed in war, and a painter must copy pictures. In this, contemplative life has the advantage: great actions are seldom seen, but the labors of art are always at hand for those who desire to know what art has been able to perform.

"When the eye or the imagination is struck with any uncommon work the next transition of an active mind is to the means by which it was performed. Here begins the true use of such contemplation; we enlarge our comprehension by new ideas, and perhaps recover some art lost to mankind, or learn what is less perfectly known in our own country. At least we compare our own with former times, and either rejoice at our improvements, or, what is the first motion towards good, discover our defects."

"I am willing," said the prince, "to see all that can deserve my search." "And I," said the princess, "shall rejoice to learn something of the manners of antiquity."

"The most pompous monument of Egyptian greatness, and one of the most bulky works of manual industry," said Imlac, "are the pyramids; fabrics<sup>2</sup> raised before the time of history, and of which the earliest narratives afford us only uncertain traditions. Of these the greatest is still standing, very little injured by time."

"Let us visit them tomorrow," said Nekayah. "I have often heard of the Pyramids, and shall not rest, till I have seen them within and without with my own eyes."

Chapter 31. They Visit the Pyramids

The resolution being thus taken, they set out the next day. They laid tents upon their camels, being resolved to stay among the pyramids till their curiosity was fully satisfied. They traveled gently, turned aside to everything remarkable, stopped from time to time and conversed with the inhabitants, and observed the various appearances of towns ruined and inhabited, of wild and cultivated nature.

2. Buildings.

When they came to the great pyramid, they were astonished at the extent of the base, and the height of the top. Imlac explained to them the principles upon which the pyramidal form was chosen for a fabric intended to coextend its duration with that of the world; he showed that its gradual diminution gave it such stability as defeated all the common attacks of the elements, and could scarcely be overthrown by earthquakes themselves, the least resistible of natural violence. A concussion that should shatter the pyramid would threaten the dissolution of the continent.

They measured all its dimensions, and pitched their tents at its foot. Next day they prepared to enter its interior apartments, and having hired the common guides, climbed up to the first passage, when the favorite of the princess, looking into the cavity, stepped back and trembled. "Pekuah," said the princess, "of what art thou afraid?" "Of the narrow entrance," answered the lady, "and of the dreadful gloom. I dare not enter a place which must surely be inhabited by unquiet souls. The original possessors of these dreadful vaults will start up before us, and perhaps shut us in forever." She spoke, and threw her arms round the neck of her mistress.

"If all your fear be of apparitions," said the prince, "I will promise you safety. There is no danger from the dead; he that is once buried will be seen no more."

"That the dead are seen no more," said Imlac, "I will not undertake to maintain, against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages, and of all nations. There is no people, rude or learned, among whom apparitions of the dead are not related and believed. This opinion, which perhaps prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its truth; those that never heard of one another would not have agreed in a tale which nothing but experience can make credible. That it is doubted by single cavaliers can very little weaken the general evidence; and some who deny it with their tongues confess it by their fears.

"Yet I do not mean to add new terrors to those which have already seized upon Pekuah. There can be no reason why specters should haunt the pyramid more than other places, or why they should have power or will to hurt innocence and purity. Our entrance is no violation of their privileges; we can take nothing from them, how then can we offend them?"

"My dear Pekuah," said the princess, "I will always go before you, and Imlac shall follow you. Remember that you are the companion of the princess of Abyssinia."

"If the princess is pleased that her servant should die," returned the lady, "let her command some death less dreadful than enclosure in this horrid cavern. You know I dare not disobey you; I must go if you command me, but if I once enter, I never shall come back."

The princess saw that her fear was too strong for expostulation or reproof, and, embracing her, told her that she should stay in the tent till their return. Pekuah was yet not satisfied, but entreated the princess not to pursue so dreadful a purpose as that of entering the recesses of the pyramid. "Though I cannot teach courage," said Nekayah, "I must not learn cowardice, nor leave at last undone what I came hither only to do."

Chapter 32. They Enter the Pyramid

Pekuah descended to the tents, and the rest entered the pyramid. They passed through the galleries, surveyed the vaults of marble, and examined the chest in which the body of the founder is supposed to have been repositied. They then sat down in one of the most spacious chambers to rest a while before they attempted to return.

"We have now," said Imlac, "gratified our minds with an exact view of the greatest work of man, except the wall of China.

"Of the wall it is very easy to assign the motive. It secured a wealthy and timorous nation from the incursions of barbarians, whose unskillfulness in arts made it easier for them to supply their wants by rapine than by industry, and who from time to time poured in upon the habitations of peaceful commerce, as vultures descend upon domestic fowl. Their celerity and fierceness made the wall necessary, and their ignorance made it efficacious.

"But for the pyramids, no reason has ever been given adequate to the cost and labor of the work. The narrowness of the chambers proves that it could afford no retreat from enemies, and treasures might have been repositied at far less expense with equal security. It seems to have been erected only in compliance with that hunger of imagination which preys incessantly upon life, and must be always appeased by some employment. Those who have already all that they can enjoy must enlarge their desires. He that has built for use till use is supplied, must begin to build for vanity, and extend his plan to the utmost power of human performance, that he may not be soon reduced to form another wish.

"I consider this mighty structure as a monument of the insufficiency of human enjoyments. A King, whose power is unlimited, and whose treasures surmount all real and imaginary wants, is compelled to solace, by the erection of a pyramid, the satiety of dominion and tastelessness of pleasures, and to amuse the tediousness of declining life by seeing thousands laboring without end, and one stone, for no purpose, laid upon another. Whoever thou art, that, not content with a moderate condition, imaginest happiness in royal magnificence, and drestest that command or riches can feed the appetite of novelty with perpetual gratifications, survey the pyramids, and confess thy folly!"

Chapter 33. The Princess Meets with an Unexpected Misfortune

They rose up, and returned through the cavity at which they had entered, and the princess prepared for her favorite a long narrative of dark labyrinths, and costly rooms, and of the different impressions which the varieties of the way had made upon her. But when they came to their train, they found every one silent and dejected: the men discovered<sup>3</sup> shame and fear in their countenances, and the women were weeping in the tents.

What had happened they did not try to conjecture, but immediately inquired. "You had scarcely entered into the pyramid," said one of the attendants, "when a troop of Arabs rushed upon us: we were too few to resist them, and too slow to escape. They were about to search the tents, set us on our camels, and drive us along before them, when the approach of some Turkish horsemen put them to flight; but they seized the lady Pekuah with her two maids, and carried them away: the Turks are now pursuing them by our instigation, but I fear they will not be able to overtake them."

The princess was overpowered with surprise and grief. Rasselas, in the first heat of his resentment, ordered his servants to follow him, and prepared to pursue the robbers with his saber in his hand. "Sir," said Imlac, "what can you hope from violence or valor? the Arabs are mounted on horses trained to battle and retreat; we have only beasts of burden. By leaving our present station we may lose the princess, but cannot hope to regain Pekuah."

In a short time the Turks returned, having not been able to reach the enemy. The princess burst out into new lamentations, and Rasselas could scarcely forbear to reproach them with cowardice; but Imlac was of opinion, that the escape of the Arabs was no addition to their misfortune, for, perhaps, they would have killed their captives rather than have resigned them.

Chapter 34. They Return to Cairo without Pekuah

There was nothing to be hoped from longer stay. They returned to Cairo repenting of their curiosity, censuring the negligence of the government, lamenting their own rashness which had neglected to procure a guard, imagining many expedients by which the loss of Pekuah might have been prevented, and resolving to do something for her recovery, though none could find any thing proper to be done.

Nekayah retired to her chamber, where her women attempted to comfort her, by telling her that all had their troubles, and that lady Pekuah had enjoyed much happiness in the world for a long time, and might reasonably expect a change of fortune. They hoped that some good would befall her wheresoever she was, and that their mistress would find another friend who might supply her place.

The princess made them no answer, and they continued the form of condolence, not much grieved in their hearts that the favorite was lost.

Next day the prince presented to the Bassa a memorial<sup>4</sup> of the wrong which he had suffered, and a petition for redress. The Bassa threatened to punish the robbers, but did not attempt to catch them, nor, indeed, could any account or description be given by which he might direct the pursuit.

It soon appeared that nothing would be done by authority. Governors, being accustomed to hear of more crimes than they can punish, and more wrongs than they can redress, set themselves at ease by indiscriminate negligence, and presently<sup>5</sup> forget the request when they lose sight of the petitioner.

Imlac then endeavored to gain some intelligence by private agents. He found many who pretended to an exact knowledge of all the haunts of the Arabs, and to regular correspondence with their chiefs, and who readily undertook the recovery of Pekuah. Of these, some were furnished with money for their journey, and came back no more; some were liberally paid for accounts which a few days discovered to be false. But the princess would not suffer any means, however improbable, to be left untried. While she was doing something she kept her hope alive. As one expedient failed, another was suggested; when one messenger returned unsuccessful, another was dispatched to a different quarter.

Two months had now passed, and of Pekuah nothing had been heard; the hopes which they had endeavored to raise in each other grew more languid, and the princess, when she saw nothing more to be tried, sunk down inconsolable in hopeless dejection. A thousand times she reproached herself with the easy compliance by which she permitted her favorite to stay behind her.

4. Statement of facts.

5. Immediately.

"Had not my fondness," said she, "lessened my authority, Pekuah had not dared to talk of her terrors. She ought to have feared me more than specters. A severe look would have overpowered her; a peremptory command would have compelled obedience. Why did foolish indulgence prevail upon me? Why did I not speak and refuse to hear?"

"Great princess," said Imlac, "do not reproach yourself for your virtue, or consider that as blameable by which evil has accidentally been caused. Your tenderness for the timidity of Pekuah was generous and kind. When we act according to our duty, we commit the event to him by whose laws our actions are governed, and who will suffer none to be finally punished for obedience. When, in prospect of some good, whether natural or moral, we break the rules prescribed us, we withdraw from the direction of superior wisdom, and take all consequences upon ourselves. Man cannot so far know the connection of causes and events, as that he may venture to do wrong in order to do right. When we pursue our end by lawful means, we may always console our miscarriage by the hope of future recompense. When we consult only our own policy, and attempt to find a nearer way to good, by overleaping the settled boundaries of right and wrong, we cannot be happy even by success, because we cannot escape the consciousness of our fault; but, if we miscarry, the disappointment is irremediably embittered. How comfortless is the sorrow of him, who feels at once the pangs of guilt, and the vexation of calamity which guilt has brought upon him?"

"Consider, princess, what would have been your condition, if the lady Pekuah had entreated to accompany you, and, being compelled to stay in the tents, had been carried away; or how would you have borne the thought, if you had forced her into the pyramid, and she had died before you in agonies of terror."

"Had either happened," said Nekayah, "I could not have endured life till now: I should have been tortured to madness by the remembrance of such cruelty, or must have pined away in abhorrence of myself."

"This at least," said Imlac, "is the present reward of virtuous conduct, that no unlucky consequence can oblige us to repent it."

Chapter 35. The Princess Languishes for Want of Pekuah

Nekayah, being thus reconciled to herself, found that no evil is insupportable but that which is accompanied with consciousness of wrong. She was, from that time, delivered from the violence of tempestuous sorrow, and sunk into silent pensiveness and gloomy tranquillity. She sat from morning to evening recollecting all that had been done or said by her Pekuah, treasured up with might recall to mind any little incident or careless conversation. The sentiments of her, whom she now expected to see no more, were treasured in her memory as rules of life, and she deliberated to no other end than to conjecture on any occasion what would have been the opinion and counsel of Pekuah.

The women, by whom she was attended, knew nothing of her real condition, and therefore she could not talk to them but with caution and reserve. She began to remit<sup>6</sup> her curiosity, having no great care to collect notions which she had no convenience of uttering. Rasselas endeavored first to comfort and afterwards to divert her; he hired musicians, to whom she seemed to listen, but did not hear them, and procured masters to instruct her in various arts, whose lectures, when they visited her again, were again to be repeated. She had lost her taste of pleasure and her ambition of excellence. And her mind, though forced into short excursions, always recurred to the image of her friend.

Imlac was every morning earnestly enjoined to renew his inquiries, and was asked every night whether he had yet heard of Pekuah, till not being able to return the princess the answer that she desired, he was less and less willing to come into her presence. She observed his backwardness, and commanded him to attend her. "You are not," said she, "to confound impatience with resentment, or to suppose that I charge you with negligence, because I repine at your unsuccessfulness. I do not much wonder at your absence; I know that the unhappy are never pleasing, and that all naturally avoid the contagion of misery. To hear complaints is wearisome alike to the wretched and the happy; for who would cloud by adventitious grief the short gleams of gaiety which life allows us? or who, that is struggling under his own evils, will add to them the miseries of another?"

"The time is at hand, when none shall be disturbed any longer by the sighs of Nekayah: my search after happiness is now at an end. I am resolved to retire from the world with all its flatteries and deceits, and will hide myself in solitude, without any other care than to compose my thoughts, and regulate my hours by a constant succession of innocent occupations, till, with a mind purified from all earthly desires, I shall enter into that state, to which all are hastening, and in which I hope again to enjoy the friendship of Pekuah."

"Do not entangle your mind," said Imlac, "by irrevocable determinations, nor increase the burden of life by a voluntary accumulation of misery: the weariness of retirement will continue or increase when the loss of Pekuah is forgotten. That you have been deprived of one pleasure is no very good reason for rejection of the rest."

"Since Pekuah was taken from me," said the princess, "I have no pleasure to reject or to retain. She that has no one to love or trust has little to hope. She wants the radical principle of happiness. We may, perhaps, allow that what satisfaction this world can afford, must arise from the conjunction of wealth, knowledge and goodness: wealth is nothing but as it is bestowed, and knowledge nothing but as it is communicated: they must therefore be imparted to others, and to whom could I now delight to impart them? Goodness affords the only comfort which can be enjoyed without a partner, and goodness may be practised in retirement."

"How far solitude may admit goodness, or advance it, I shall not," replied Imlac, "dispute at present. Remember the confession of the pious hermit. You will wish to return into the world, when the image of your companion has left your thoughts." "That time," said Nekayah, "will never come. The generous frankness, the modest obsequiousness,<sup>7</sup> and the faithful secrecy of my dear Pekuah, will always be more missed, as I shall live longer to see vice and folly."

"The state of a mind oppressed with a sudden calamity," said Imlac, "is like that of the fabulous inhabitants of the new created earth, who, when the first night came upon them, supposed that day never would return. When the clouds of sorrow gather over us, we see nothing beyond them, nor can imagine how they will be dispelled: yet a new day succeeded to the night, and sorrow is never long without a dawn of ease. But they who restrain themselves from receiving comfort, do as the savages would have done, had they put out their eyes when it was dark. Our minds, like our bodies, are in continual flux; something is hourly lost, and something acquired. To lose much at once is inconvenient to either, but while the vital powers remain uninjured, nature will find the means of reparation. Distance has the same effect on the mind as on the eye, and while we glide along the stream of time, whatever we leave behind us is always lessening, and that which we approach increasing in magnitude. Do not suffer life to stagnate; it will grow muddy for want of motion: commit yourself again to the current of the world; Pekuah will vanish by degrees; you will meet in your way some other favorite, or learn to diffuse yourself in general conversation."

"At least," said the prince, "do not despair before all remedies have been tried: the inquiry after the unfortunate lady is still continued, and shall be carried on with yet greater diligence, on condition that you will promise to wait a year for the event, without any unalterable resolution."

Nekayah thought this a reasonable demand, and made the promise to her brother, who had been advised by Imlac to require it. Imlac had, indeed, no great hope of regaining Pekuah, but he supposed, that if he could secure the interval of a year, the princess would be then in no danger of a cloister.

Chapter 36. Pekuah Is Still Remembered. The Progress of Sorrow

Nekayah, seeing that nothing was omitted for the recovery of her favorite, and having, by her promise, set her intention of retirement at a distance, began imperceptibly to return to common cares and common pleasures. She rejoiced without her own consent at the suspension of her sorrows, and sometimes caught herself with indignation in the act of turning away her mind from the remembrance of her, whom yet she resolved never to forget.

She then appointed a certain hour of the day for meditation on the merits and fondness of Pekuah, and for some weeks retired constantly at the time fixed, and returned with her eyes swollen and her countenance clouded. By degrees she grew less scrupulous, and suffered any important and pressing avocation to delay the tribute of daily tears. She then yielded to less occasions; sometimes forgot what she was indeed afraid to remember, and, at last, wholly released herself from the duty of periodical affliction.

Her real love of Pekuah was yet not diminished. A thousand occurrences brought her back to memory, and a thousand wants, which nothing but the confidence of friendship can supply, made her frequently regretted. She, therefore, solicited Imlac never to desist from inquiry, and to leave no art of intelligence untried, that, at least, she might have the comfort of knowing that she did not suffer by negligence or sluggishness. "Yet what," said she, "is to be expected from our pursuit of happiness, when we find the state of life to be such, that happiness itself is the cause of misery? Why should we endeavor to attain that, of which the possession cannot be secured? I shall henceforward fear to yield my heart to excellence, however bright, or to fondness, however tender, lest I should lose again what I have lost in Pekuah."

Chapter 37. The Princess Hears News of Pekuah

In seven months, one of the messengers, who had been sent away upon the day when the promise was drawn from the princess, returned, after many unsuccessful rambles, from the borders of Nubia, with an account that Pekuah was in the hands of an Arab chief, who possessed a castle or fortress on the extremity of Egypt. The Arab, whose revenue was plunder, was willing to restore her, with her two attendants, for two hundred ounces of gold.

The price was no subject of debate. The princess was in ecstasies when she heard that her favorite was alive, and might so cheaply be ransomed. She could not think of delaying for a moment Pekuah's happiness or her own, but entreated her brother to send back the messenger with the sum required. Imlac, being consulted, was not very confident of the veracity of the relator, and was still more doubtful of the Arab's faith, who might, if he were too liberally trusted, detain at once the money and the captives. He thought it dangerous to put themselves in the power of the Arab, by going into his district, and could not expect that the rover<sup>8</sup> would so much expose himself as to come into the lower country, where he might be seized by the forces of the Bassa.

It is difficult to negotiate where neither will trust. But Imlac, after some deliberation, directed the messenger to propose that Pekuah should be conducted by ten horsemen to the monastery of St. Anthony, which is situated in the deserts of Upper Egypt, where she should be met by the same number, and her ransom should be paid.

That no time might be lost, as they expected that the proposal would not be refused, they immediately began their journey to the monastery; and, when they arrived, Imlac went forward with the former messenger to the Arab's fortress. Rasselas was desirous to go with them, but neither his sister nor Imlac would consent. The Arab, according to the custom of his nation, observed the laws of hospitality with great exactness to those who put themselves into his power, and, in a few days, brought Pekuah with her maids, by easy journeys, to their place appointed, where receiving the stipulated price, he restored her with great respect to liberty and her friends, and undertook to conduct them back toward Cairo beyond all danger of robbery or violence.

The princess and her favorite embraced each other with transport too violent to be expressed, and went out together to pour the tears of tenderness in secret, and exchange professions of kindness and gratitude. After a few hours they returned into the refectory of the convent, where, in the presence of the prior and his brethren, the prince required of Pekuah the history of her adventures.

Chapter 38. The Adventures of the Lady Pekuah

"At what time, and in what manner, I was forced away," said Pekuah, "your servants have told you. The suddenness of the event struck me with surprise, and I was at first rather stupified than agitated with any passion of either fear or sorrow. My confusion was increased by the speed and tumult of our flight while we were followed by the Turks, who, as it seemed, soon despaired to overtake us, or were afraid of those whom they made a show of menacing.

"When the Arabs saw themselves out of danger they slackened their course, and, as I was less harassed by external violence, I began to feel more uneasiness in my mind. After some time we stopped near a spring shaded with trees in a pleasant meadow, where we were set upon the ground, and offered such refreshments as our masters were partaking. I was suffered to sit with my maids apart from the rest, and none attempted to comfort or insult us. Here

8. Robber.

I first began to feel the full weight of my misery. The girls sat weeping in silence, and from time to time looked on me for succor. I knew not to what condition we were doomed, nor could conjecture where would be the place of our captivity, or whence to draw any hope of deliverance. I was in the hands of robbers and savages, and had no reason to suppose that their pity was more than their justice, or that they would forbear the gratification of any ardor of desire, or caprice of cruelty. I, however, kissed my maids, and endeavored to pacify them by remarking, that we were yet treated with decency, and that, since we were now carried beyond pursuit, there was no danger of violence to our lives.

"When we were to be set again on horseback, my maids clung round me, and refused to be parted, but I commanded them not to irritate those who had us in their power. We traveled the remaining part of the day through an unfrequented and pathless country, and came by moonlight to the side of a hill, where the rest of the troop was stationed. Their tents were pitched, and their fires kindled, and our chief was welcomed as a man much beloved by his dependents.

"We were received into a large tent, where we found women who had attended their husbands in the expedition. They set before us the supper which they had provided, and I eat it rather to encourage my maids than to comply with any appetite of my own. When the meat was taken away they spread the carpets for repose. I was weary, and hoped to find in sleep that remission of distress which nature seldom denies. Ordering myself therefore to be undressed, I observed that the women looked very earnestly upon me, not expecting, I suppose, to see me so submissively attended. When my upper vest was taken off, they were apparently struck with the splendor of my clothes, and one of them timorously laid her hand upon the embroidery. She then went out, and, in a short time, came back with another woman, who seemed to be of higher rank, and greater authority. She did, at her entrance, the usual act of reverence, and, taking me by the hand, placed me in a smaller tent, spread with finer carpets, where I spent the night quietly with my maids.

"In the morning, as I was sitting on the grass, the chief of the troop came towards me: I rose up to receive him, and he bowed with great respect. 'Illustrious lady,' said he, 'my fortune is better than I had presumed to hope; I am told by my women that I have a princess in my camp.' 'Sir,' answered I, 'your women have deceived themselves and you; I am not a princess, but an unhappy stranger who intended soon to have left this country, in which I am now to be imprisoned for ever.' 'Whoever, or whencesoever, you are,' returned the Arab, 'your dress, and that of your servants, show your rank to be high, and your wealth to be great. Why should you, who can so easily procure your ransom, think yourself in danger of perpetual captivity? The purpose of my incursions is to increase my riches, or more properly to gather tribute. The sons of Ishmael<sup>9</sup> are the natural and hereditary lords of this part of the continent, which is usurped by late invaders, and low-born tyrants, from whom we are compelled to take by the sword what is denied to justice. The violence of war admits no distinction; the lance that is lifted at guilt and power will sometimes fall on innocence and gentleness.'

" 'How little,' said I, 'did I expect that yesterday it should have fallen upon me.'

9. Arabs, who claim descent from Ishmael, a son of Abraham.

" 'Misfortunes,' answered the Arab, 'should always be expected. If the eye of hostility could learn reverence or pity, excellence like yours had been exempt from injury. But the angels of affliction spread their toils alike for the virtuous and the wicked, for the mighty and the mean. Do not be disconsolate; I am not one of the lawless and cruel rovers of the desert; I know the rules of civil life: I will fix your ransom, give a passport to your messenger, and perform my stipulation with nice punctuality.'<sup>1</sup>

"You will easily believe that I was pleased with his courtesy; and finding that his predominant passion was desire of money, I began now to think my danger less, for I knew that no sum would be thought too great for the release of Pekuah. I told him that he should have no reason to charge me with ingratitude, if I was used with kindness, and that any ransom, which could be expected for a maid of common rank, would be paid, but that he must not persist to rate me as a princess. He said, he would consider what he should demand, and then, smiling, bowed and retired.

"Soon after the women came about me, each contending to be more officious<sup>2</sup> than the other, and my maids themselves were served with reverence. We traveled onward by short journeys. On the fourth day the chief told me, that my ransom must be two hundred ounces of gold, which I not only promised him, but told him, that I would add fifty more, if I and my maids were honorably treated.

"I never knew the power of gold before. From that time I was the leader of the troop. The march of every day was longer or shorter as I commanded, and the tents were pitched where I chose to rest. We now had camels and other conveniences for travel, my own women were always at my side, and I amused myself with observing the manners of the vagrant nations,<sup>3</sup> and with viewing remains of ancient edifices with which these deserted countries appear to have been, in some distant age, lavishly embellished.

"The chief of the band was a man far from illiterate: he was able to travel by the stars or the compass, and had marked in his erratic expeditions such places as are most worthy the notice of a passenger.<sup>4</sup> He observed to me, that buildings are always best preserved in places little frequented, and difficult of access: for, when once a country declines from its primitive splendor, the more inhabitants are left, the quicker ruin will be made. Walls supply stones more easily than quarries, and palaces and temples will be demolished to make stables of granite, and cottages of porphyry.

"We wandered about in this manner for some weeks, whether, as our chief pretended, for my gratification, or, as I rather suspected, for some convenience of his own. I endeavored to appear contented where sullenness and resentment would have been of no use, and that endeavor conduced much to the calmness of my mind; but my heart was always with Nekayah, and the troubles of the night much overbalanced the amusements of the day. My women, who threw all their cares upon their mistress, set their minds at ease from the time when they saw me treated with respect, and gave themselves up to the incidental alleviations of our fatigue without solicitude or sorrow. I was pleased with their pleasure, and animated with their confidence. My condition had lost much of its terror, since I found that the Arab ranged the country merely to get riches. Avarice is an uniform and tractable vice: other intellectual distempers are different in different constitutions of mind; that which soothes the pride of one will offend the pride of another; but to the favor of the covetous there is a ready way, bring money and nothing is denied.

"At last we came to the dwelling of our chief, a strong and spacious house built with stone in an island of the Nile, which lies, as I was told, under the tropic. 'Lady,' said the Arab, 'you shall rest after your journey a few weeks in this place, where you are to consider yourself as sovereign. My occupation is war: I have therefore chosen this obscure residence, from which I can issue unexpected, and to which I can retire unpursued. You may now repose in security: here are few pleasures, but here is no danger.' He then led me into the inner apartments, and seating me on the richest couch, bowed to the ground. His women, who considered me as a rival, looked on me with malignity; but being soon informed that I was a great lady detained only for my ransom, they began to vie with each other in obsequiousness and reverence.

"Being again comforted with new assurances of speedy liberty, I was for some days diverted from impatience by the novelty of the place. The turrets overlooked the country to a great distance, and afforded a view of many windings of the stream. In the day I wandered from one place to another as the course of the sun varied the splendor of the prospect, and saw many things which I had never seen before. The crocodiles and river-horses<sup>5</sup> are common in this unpeopled region, and I often looked upon them with terror, though I knew that they could not hurt me. For some time I expected to see mermaids and tritons, which, as Imlac has told me, the European travelers have stationed in the Nile, but no such beings ever appeared, and the Arab, when I inquired after them, laughed at my credulity.

"At night the Arab always attended me to a tower set apart for celestial observations, where he endeavored to teach me the names and courses of the stars. I had no great inclination to this study, but an appearance of attention was necessary to please my instructor, who valued himself for his skill, and, in a little while, I found some employment requisite to beguile the tediousness of time, which was to be passed always amidst the same objects. I was weary of looking in the morning on things from which I had turned away weary in the evening: I therefore was at last willing to observe the stars rather than do nothing, but could not always compose my thoughts, and was very often thinking on Nekayah when others imagined me contemplating the sky. Soon after the Arab went upon another expedition, and then my only pleasure was to talk with my maids about the accident by which we were carried away, and the happiness that we should all enjoy at the end of our captivity."

"There were women in your Arab's fortress," said the princess, "why did you not make them your companions, enjoy their conversation, and partake their diversions? In a place where they found business or amusement, why should you alone sit corroded with idle melancholy? or why could not you bear for a few months that condition to which they were condemned for life?"

"The diversions of the women," answered Pekuah, "were only childish play, by which the mind accustomed to stronger operations could not be kept busy. I could do all which they delighted in doing by powers merely sensitive,<sup>6</sup> while my intellectual faculties were flown to Cairo. They ran from room to room as a bird hops from wire to wire in his cage. They danced for the sake of motion, as lambs frisk in a meadow. One sometimes pretended to be hurt that the rest might be alarmed, or hid herself that another might seek her. Part of their time passed in watching the progress of light bodies that floated on the river, and part in marking the various forms into which clouds broke in the sky.

"Their business was only needlework, in which I and my maids sometimes helped them; but you know that the mind will easily straggle from the fingers, nor will you suspect that captivity and absence from Nekayah could receive solace from silken flowers.

"Nor was much satisfaction to be hoped from their conversation: for of what could they be expected to talk? They had seen nothing; for they had lived from early youth in that narrow spot: of what they had not seen they could have no knowledge, for they could not read. They had no ideas but of the few things that were within their view, and had hardly names for anything but their clothes and their food. As I bore a superior character, I was often called to terminate their quarrels, which I decided as equitably as I could. If it could have amused me to hear the complaints of each against the rest, I might have been often detained by long stories, but the motives of their animosity were so small that I could not listen without intercepting the tale."

"How," said Rasselas, "can the Arab, whom you represented as a man of more than common accomplishments, take any pleasure in his seraglio, when it is filled only with women like these. Are they exquisitely beautiful?"

"They do not," said Pekuah, "want that unassuming and ignoble beauty which may subsist without spriteliness or sublimity, without energy of thought or dignity of virtue. But to a man like the Arab such beauty was only a flower casually plucked and carelessly thrown away. Whatever pleasures he might find among them, they were not those of friendship or society. When they were playing about him he looked on them with inattentive superiority: when they vied for his regard he sometimes turned away disgusted. As they had no knowledge, their talk could take nothing from the tediousness of life: as they had no choice, their fondness, or appearance of fondness, excited in him neither pride nor gratitude; he was not exalted in his own esteem by the smiles of a woman who saw no other man, nor was much obliged by that regard, of which he could never know the sincerity, and which he might often perceive to be exerted not so much to delight him as to pain a rival. That which he gave, and they received, as love, was only a careless distribution of superfluous time, such love as man can bestow upon that which he despises, such as has neither hope nor fear, neither joy nor sorrow."

"You have reason, lady, to think yourself happy," said Imlac, "that you have been thus easily dismissed. How could a mind, hungry for knowledge, be willing, in an intellectual famine, to lose such a banquet as Pekuah's conversation?"

"I am inclined to believe," answered Pekuah, "that he was for some time in suspense; for, notwithstanding his promise, whenever I proposed to dispatch a messenger to Cairo, he found some excuse for delay. While I was detained in his house he made many incursions into the neighboring countries, and, perhaps, he would have refused to discharge me, had his plunder been equal to his wishes. He returned always courteous, related his adventures, delighted to hear my observations, and endeavored to advance my acquaintance with the stars. When I importuned him to send away my letters, he soothed me with professions of honor and sincerity; and, when I could be no longer decently denied, put his troop again in motion, and left me to govern in his absence. I was much afflicted by this studied procrastination, and was sometimes afraid that I should be forgotten; that you would leave Cairo, and I must end my days in an island of the Nile.

"I grew at last hopeless and dejected, and cared so little to entertain him, that he for a while more frequently talked with my maids. That he should fall in love with them, or with me, might have been equally fatal, and I was not much pleased with the growing friendship. My anxiety was not long; for, as I recovered some degree of cheerfulness, he returned to me, and I could not forbear to despise my former uneasiness.

"He still delayed to send for my ransom, and would, perhaps, never have determined, had not your agent found his way to him. The gold, which he would not fetch, he could not reject when it was offered. He hastened to prepare for our journey hither, like a man delivered from the pain of an intestine conflict. I took leave of my companions in the house, who dismissed me with cold indifference."

Nekayah, having heard her favorite's relation, rose and embraced her, and Rasselas gave her an hundred ounces of gold, which she presented to the Arab for the fifty that were promised.

Chapter 40. The History of a Man of Learning

They returned to Cairo, and were so well pleased at finding themselves together, that none of them went much abroad. The prince began to love learning, and one day declared to Imlac, that he intended to devote himself to science,<sup>7</sup> and pass the rest of his days in literary solitude.

"Before you make your final choice," answered Imlac, "you ought to examine its hazards, and converse with some of those who are grown old in the company of themselves. I have just left the observatory of one of the most learned astronomers in the world, who has spent forty years in unwearied attention to the motions and appearances of the celestial bodies, and has drawn out his soul in endless calculations. He admits a few friends once a month to hear his deductions and enjoy his discoveries. I was introduced as a man of knowledge worthy of his notice. Men of various ideas and fluent conversation are commonly welcome to those whose thoughts have been long fixed upon a single point, and who find the images of other things stealing away. I delighted him with my remarks, he smiled at the narrative of my travels, and was glad to forget the constellations, and descend for a moment into the lower world.

"On the next day of vacation<sup>8</sup> I renewed my visit, and was so fortunate as to please him again. He relaxed from that time the severity of his rule, and permitted me to enter at my own choice. I found him always busy, and always glad to be relieved. As each knew much which the other was desirous of learning, we exchanged our notions with great delight. I perceived that I had every day more of his confidence, and always found new cause of admiration in the profundity of his mind. His comprehension is vast, his memory capacious and retentive, his discourse is methodical, and his expression clear.

"His integrity and benevolence are equal to his learning. His deepest researches and most favorite studies are willingly interrupted for any opportunity of doing good by his counsel or his riches. To his closest retreat,<sup>9</sup> at his most busy moments, all are admitted that want his assistance: 'For though I exclude idleness and pleasure, I will never,' says he, 'bar my doors against charity. To man is permitted the contemplation of the skies, but the practice of virtue is commanded.' "

"Surely," said the princess, "this man is happy."

"I visited him," said Imlac, "with more and more frequency, and was every time more enamored of his conversation: he was sublime without haughtiness, courteous without formality, and communicative without ostentation. I was at first, great princess, of your opinion, thought him the happiest of mankind, and often congratulated him on the blessing that he enjoyed. He seemed to hear nothing with indifference but the praises of his condition, to which he always returned a general answer, and diverted the conversation to some other topic.

"Amidst this willingness to be pleased, and labor to please, I had quickly reason to imagine that some painful sentiment pressed upon his mind. He often looked up earnestly towards the sun, and let his voice fall in the midst of his discourse. He would sometimes, when we were alone, gaze upon me in silence with the air of a man who longed to speak what he was yet resolved to suppress. He would often send for me with vehement injunctions of haste, though, when I came to him, he had nothing extraordinary to say. And sometimes, when I was leaving him, he would call me back, pause a few moments and then dismiss me.

Chapter 41. The Astronomer Discovers the Cause of His Uneasiness

"At last the time came when the secret burst his reserve. We were sitting together last night in the turret of his house, watching the emersion of a satellite of Jupiter. A sudden tempest clouded the sky, and disappointed our observation. We sat a while silent in the dark, and then he addressed himself to me in these words: 'Imlac, I have long considered thy friendship as the greatest blessing of my life. Integrity without knowledge is weak and useless, and knowledge without integrity is dangerous and dreadful. I have found in thee all the qualities requisite for trust, benevolence, experience, and fortitude. I have long discharged an office which I must soon quit at the call of nature, and shall rejoice in the hour of imbecility<sup>1</sup> and pain to devolve it upon thee.'

"I thought myself honored by this testimony, and protested that whatever could conduce to his happiness would add likewise to mine.

"Hear, Imlac, what thou wilt not without difficulty credit. I have possessed for five years the regulation of weather, and the distribution of the seasons: the sun has listened to my dictates, and passed from tropic to tropic by my direction; the clouds, at my call, have poured their waters, and the Nile has overflowed at my command; I have restrained the rage of the dog-star, and mitigated the fervors of the crab.<sup>2</sup> The winds alone, of all the elemental powers, have hitherto refused my authority, and multitudes have perished by equinoctial tempests which I found myself unable to prohibit or restrain. I have administered this great office with exact justice, and made to the different nations of the earth an impartial dividend of rain and sunshine. What must have been the misery of half the globe, if I had limited the clouds to particular regions, or confined the sun to either side of the equator?'

Chapter 42. The Opinion of the Astronomer Is Explained and Justified

"I suppose he discovered in me, through the obscurity of the room, some tokens of amazement and doubt, for, after a short pause, he proceeded thus:

" 'Not to be easily credited will neither surprise nor offend me; for I am, probably, the first of human beings to whom this trust has been imparted. Nor do I know whether to deem this distinction a reward or punishment; since I have possessed it I have been far less happy than before, and nothing but the consciousness of good intention could have enabled me to support the weariness of unremitted vigilance.'

" 'How long, Sir,' said I, 'has this great office been in your hands?'

" 'About ten years ago,' said he, 'my daily observations of the changes of the sky led me to consider, whether, if I had the power of the seasons, I could confer greater plenty upon the inhabitants of the earth. This contemplation fastened on my mind, and I sat days and nights in imaginary dominion, pouring upon this country and that the showers of fertility, and seconding every fall of rain with a due proportion of sunshine. I had yet only the will to do good, and did not imagine that I should ever have the power.'

" 'One day as I was looking on the fields withering with heat, I felt in my mind a sudden wish that I could send rain on the southern mountains, and raise the Nile to an inundation. In the hurry of my imagination I commanded rain to fall, and, by comparing the time of my command, with that of the inundation, I found that the clouds had listened to my lips.'

" 'Might not some other cause,' said I, 'produce this concurrence? the Nile does not always rise on the same day.'

" 'Do not believe,' said he with impatience, 'that such objections could escape me: I reasoned long against my own conviction, and labored against truth with the utmost obstinacy. I sometimes suspected myself of madness, and should not have dared to impart this secret but to a man like you, capable of distinguishing the wonderful from the impossible, and the incredible from the false.'

" 'Why, Sir,' said I, 'do you call that incredible, which you know, or think you know, to be true?'

" 'Because,' said he, 'I cannot prove it by any external evidence; and I know too well the laws of demonstration to think that my conviction ought to influence another, who cannot, like me, be conscious of its force. I therefore shall not attempt to gain credit by disputation. It is sufficient that I feel this power, that I have long possessed, and every day exerted it. But the life of man is short, the infirmities of age increase upon me, and the time will soon come when the regulator of the year must mingle with the dust. The care of appointing a successor has long disturbed me; the night and the day have been spent in comparisons of all the characters which have come to my knowledge, and I have yet found none so worthy as thyself.'

Chapter 43. The Astronomer Leaves Imlac His Directions

" 'Hear therefore, what I shall impart, with attention, such as the welfare of a world requires. If the task of a king be considered as difficult, who has the care only of a few millions, to whom he cannot do much good or harm, what must be the anxiety of him, on whom depends the action of the elements, and the great gifts of light and heat!—Hear me therefore with attention.

"I have diligently considered the position of the earth and sun, and formed innumerable schemes in which I changed their situation. I have sometimes turned aside the axis of the earth, and sometimes varied the ecliptic of the sun: but I have found it impossible to make a disposition by which the world may be advantaged; what one region gains, another loses by any imaginable alteration, even without considering the distant parts of the solar system with which we are unacquainted. Do not, therefore, in thy administration of the year, indulge thy pride by innovation; do not please thyself with thinking that thou canst make thyself renowned to all future ages, by disordering the seasons. The memory of mischief is no desirable fame. Much less will it become thee to let kindness or interest prevail. Never rob other countries of rain to pour it on thine own. For us the Nile is sufficient.'

"I promised that when I possessed the power, I would use it with inflexible integrity, and he dismissed me, pressing my hand. 'My heart,' said he, 'will be now at rest, and my benevolence will no more destroy my quiet: I have found a man of wisdom and virtue, to whom I can cheerfully bequeath the inheritance of the sun.' "

The prince heard this narration with very serious regard, but the princess smiled, and Pekuah convulsed herself with laughter. "Ladies," said Imlac, "to mock the heaviest of human afflictions is neither charitable nor wise. Few can attain this man's knowledge, and few practice his virtues; but all may suffer his calamity. Of the uncertainties of our present state, the most dreadful and alarming is the uncertain continuance of reason."

The princess was recollected, and the favorite was abashed. Rasselas, more deeply affected, inquired of Imlac, whether he thought such maladies of the mind frequent, and how they were contracted.

Chapter 44. The Dangerous Prevalence<sup>3</sup> of Imagination

"Disorders of intellect," answered Imlac, "happen much more often than superficial observers will easily believe. Perhaps, if we speak with rigorous exactness, no human mind is in its right state. There is no man whose imagination does not sometimes predominate over his reason, who can regulate his attention wholly by his will, and whose ideas will come and go at his command. No man will be found in whose mind airy notions do not sometimes tyrannize, and force him to hope or fear beyond the limits of sober probability. All power of fancy over reason is a degree of insanity; but while this power is such as we can control and repress, it is not visible to others, nor considered as any deprivation of the mental faculties; it is not pronounced madness but when it comes ungovernable, and apparently influences speech or action.

"To indulge the power of fiction, and send imagination out upon the wing, is often the sport of those who delight too much in silent speculation. When we are alone we are not always busy; the labor of excogitation is too violent to last long; the ardor of inquiry will sometimes give way to idleness or satiety. He who has nothing external that can divert him must find pleasure in his own thoughts, and must conceive himself what he is not; for who is pleased with what he is? He then expatiates in boundless futurity, and culls from all imaginable conditions that which for the present moment he should most desire, amuses his desires with impossible enjoyments, and confers upon his pride unattainable dominion. The mind dances from scene to scene, unites all pleasures in all combinations, and riots in delights which nature and fortune, with all their bounty, cannot bestow.

"In time, some particular train of ideas fixes the attention; all other intellectual gratifications are rejected; the mind, in weariness or leisure, recurs constantly to the favorite conception, and feasts on the luscious falsehood, whenever she is offended with the bitterness of truth. By degrees the reign of fancy is confirmed; she grows first imperious, and in time despotic. Then fictions begin to operate as realities, false opinions fasten upon the mind, and life passes in dreams of rapture or of anguish.

"This, sir, is one of the dangers of solitude, which the hermit has confessed not always to promote goodness, and the astronomer's misery has proved to be not always propitious to wisdom."

"I will no more," said the favorite, "imagine myself the queen of Abyssinia. I have often spent the hours which the princess gave to my own disposal, in adjusting ceremonies and regulating the court; I have repressed the pride of the powerful, and granted the petitions of the poor; I have built new palaces in more happy situations, planted groves upon the tops of mountains, and have exulted in the beneficence of royalty, till, when the princess entered, I had almost forgotten to bow down before her."

"And I," said the princess, "will not allow myself any more to play the shepherdess in my waking dreams. I have often soothed my thoughts with the quiet and innocence of pastoral employments, till I have in my chamber heard the winds whistle, and the sheep bleat; sometimes freed the lamb entangled in the thicket, and sometimes with my crook encountered the wolf. I have a dress like that of the village maids, which I put on to help my imagination, and a pipe on which I play softly, and suppose myself followed by my flocks."

"I will confess," said the prince, "an indulgence of fantastic delight more dangerous than yours. I have frequently endeavored to image the possibility of a perfect government, by which all wrong should be restrained, all vice reformed, and all the subjects preserved in tranquility and innocence. This thought produced innumerable schemes of reformation, and dictated many useful regulations and salutary edicts. This has been the sport, and sometimes the labor, of my solitude; and I start, when I think with how little anguish I once supposed the death of my father and my brothers."

"Such," says Imlac, "are the effects of visionary schemes; when we first form them, we know them to be absurd, but familiarize them by degrees, and in time lose sight of their folly."

Chapter 45. They Discourse with an Old Man

The evening was now far past, and they rose to return home. As they walked along the bank of the Nile, delighted with the beams of the moon quivering on the water, they saw at a small distance an old man, whom the prince had often heard in the assembly of the sages. "Yonder," said he, "is one whose years have calmed his passions, but not clouded his reason. Let us close the disquisitions of the night by inquiring what are his sentiments of his own state, that we may know whether youth alone is to struggle with vexation, and whether any better hope remains for the latter part of life."

Here the sage approached and saluted them. They invited him to join their walk, and prattled a while, as acquaintance that had unexpectedly met one another. The old man was cheerful and talkative, and the way seemed short in his company. He was pleased to find himself not disregarded, accompanied them to their house, and, at the prince's request, entered with them. They placed him in the seat of honor, and set wine and conserves before him.

"Sir," said the princess, "an evening walk must give to a man of learning like you pleasures which ignorance and youth can hardly conceive. You know the qualities and the causes of all that you behold, the laws by which the river flows, the periods in which the planets perform their revolutions. Everything must supply you with contemplation, and renew the consciousness of your own dignity."

"Lady," answered he, "let the gay and the vigorous expect pleasure in their excursions; it is enough that age can obtain ease. To me the world has lost its novelty; I look round, and see what I remember to have seen in happier days. I rest against a tree, and consider that in the same shade I once disputed upon the annual overflow of the Nile with a friend who is now silent in the grave. I cast my eyes upward, fix them on the changing moon, and think with pain on the vicissitudes of life. I have ceased to take much delight in physical truth; for what have I to do with those things which I am soon to leave?"

"You may at least recreate<sup>4</sup> yourself," said Imlac, "with the recollection of an honorable and useful life, and enjoy the praise which all agree to give you."

"Praise," said the sage with a sigh, "is to an old man an empty sound. I have neither mother to be delighted with the reputation of her son, nor wife to partake the honors of her husband. I have outlived my friends and my rivals. Nothing is now of much importance; for I cannot extend my interest beyond myself. Youth is delighted with applause, because it is considered as the earnest of some future good, and because the prospect of life is far extended; but to me, who am now declining to decrepitude, there is little to be feared from the malevolence of men, and yet less to be hoped from their affection or esteem. Something they may yet take away, but they can give me nothing. Riches would now be useless, and high employment would be pain. My retrospect of life recalls to my view many opportunities of good neglected, much time squandered upon trifles, and more lost in idleness and vacancy. I leave many great designs unattempted, and many great attempts unfinished. My mind is burthened with no heavy crime, and therefore I compose myself to tranquility; endeavor to abstract my thoughts from hopes and cares which, though reason knows them to be vain, still try to keep their old possession of the heart; expect,<sup>5</sup> with serene humility, that hour which nature cannot long delay; and hope to possess, in a better state, that happiness which here I could not find, and that virtue which here I have not attained."

He arose and went away, leaving his audience not much elated with the hope of long life. The prince consoled himself with remarking that it was not reasonable to be disappointed by this account; for age had never been considered as the season of felicity, and if it was possible to be easy in decline and weakness, it was likely that the days of vigor and alacrity might be happy; that the noon of life might be bright, if the evening could be calm.

The princess suspected that age was querulous and malignant, and delighted to repress the expectations of those who had newly entered the world. She had seen the possessors of estates look with envy on their heirs, and known many who enjoy pleasure no longer than they can confine it to themselves.

5. Await.

Pekuah conjectured that the man was older than he appeared, and was willing to impute his complaints to delirious dejection; or else supposed that he had been unfortunate, and was therefore discontented. "For nothing," said she, "is more common than to call our own condition the condition of life."

Imlac, who had no desire to see them depressed, smiled at the comforts which they could so readily procure to themselves, and remembered that, at the same age, he was equally confident of unmingled prosperity, and equally fertile of consolatory expedients. He forbore to force upon them unwelcome knowledge, which time itself would too soon impress. The princess and her lady retired; the madness of the astronomer hung upon their minds, and they desired Imlac to enter upon his office, and delay next morning the rising of the sun.

Chapter 46. The Princess and Pekuah Visit the Astronomer

The princess and Pekuah, having talked in private of Imlac's astronomer, thought his character at once so amiable and so strange, that they could not be satisfied without a nearer knowledge, and Imlac was requested to find the means of bringing them together.

This was somewhat difficult; the philosopher had never received any visits from women, though he lived in a city that had in it many Europeans who followed the manners of their own countries, and many from other parts of the world that lived there with European liberty. The ladies would not be refused, and several schemes were proposed for the accomplishment of their design. It was proposed to introduce them as strangers in distress, to whom the sage was always accessible; but, after some deliberation, it appeared, that by this artifice, no acquaintance could be formed, for their conversation would be short, and they could not decently importune him often. "This," said Rasselas, "is true; but I have yet a stronger objection against the misrepresentation of your state. I have always considered it as treason against the great republic of human nature, to make any man's virtues the means of deceiving him, whether on great or little occasions. All imposture weakens confidence and chills benevolence. When the sage finds that you are not what you seemed, he will feel the resentment natural to a man who, conscious of great abilities, discovers that he has been tricked by understandings meaner than his own, and, perhaps, the distrust, which he can never afterwards wholly lay aside, may stop the voice of counsel, and close the hand of charity; and where will you find the power of restoring his benefactions to mankind, or his peace to himself?"

To this no reply was attempted, and Imlac began to hope that their curiosity would subside; but next day Pekuah told him, she had now found an honest pretense for a visit to the astronomer, for she would solicit permission to continue under him the studies in which she had been initiated by the Arab, and the princess might go with her either as a fellow-student, or because a woman could not decently come alone. "I am afraid," said Imlac, "that he will be soon weary of your company: men advanced far in knowledge do not love to repeat the elements of their art, and I am not certain, that even of the elements, as he will deliver them connected with inferences, and mingled with reflections, you are a very capable auditress." "That," said Pekuah, "must be my care: I ask of you only to take me thither. My knowledge is, perhaps, more than you imagine it, and by concurring always with his opinions I shall make him think it greater than it is."

The astronomer, in pursuance of this resolution, was told, that a foreign lady, traveling in search of knowledge, had heard of his reputation, and was desirous to become his scholar. The uncommonness of the proposal raised at once his surprise and curiosity, and when, after a short deliberation, he consented to admit her, he could not stay without impatience till the next day.

The ladies dressed themselves magnificently, and were attended by Imlac to the astronomer, who was pleased to see himself approached with respect by persons of so splendid an appearance. In the exchange of the first civilities he was timorous and bashful; but when the talk became regular, he recollected his powers, and justified the character which Imlac had given. Inquiring of Pekuah what could have turned her inclination towards astronomy, he received from her a history of her adventure at the pyramid, and of the time passed in the Arab's island. She told her tale with ease and elegance, and her conversation took possession of his heart. The discourse was then turned to astronomy: Pekuah displayed what she knew: he looked upon her as a prodigy of genius, and entreated her not to desist from a study which she had so happily begun.

They came again and again, and were every time more welcome than before. The sage endeavored to amuse them, that they might prolong their visits, for he found his thoughts grow brighter in their company; the clouds of solicitude vanished by degrees, as he forced himself to entertain them, and he grieved when he was left at their departure to his old employment of regulating the seasons.

The princess and her favorite had now watched his lips for several months, and could not catch a single word from which they could judge whether he continued, or not, in the opinion of his preternatural commission. They often contrived to bring him to an open declaration, but he easily eluded all their attacks, and on which side soever they pressed him escaped from them to some other topic.

As their familiarity increased they invited him often to the house of Imlac, where they distinguished him by extraordinary respect. He began gradually to delight in sublunary pleasures. He came early and departed late; labored to recommend himself by assiduity and compliance; excited their curiosity after new arts, that they might still want his assistance; and when they made any excursion of pleasure or inquiry, entreated to attend them.

By long experience of his integrity and wisdom, the prince and his sister were convinced that he might be trusted without danger; and lest he should draw any false hopes from the civilities which he received, discovered to him their condition, with the motives of their journey, and required his opinion on the choice of life.

"Of the various conditions which the world spreads before you, which you shall prefer," said the sage, "I am not able to instruct you. I can only tell that I have chosen wrong. I have passed my time in study without experience; in the attainment of sciences which can, for the most part, be but remotely useful to mankind. I have purchased knowledge at the expense of all the common comforts of life: I have missed the endearing elegance of female friendship, and the happy commerce of domestic tenderness. If I have obtained any prerogatives above other students, they have been accompanied with fear, disquiet, and scrupulosity; but even of these prerogatives, whatever they were, I have, since my thoughts have been diversified by more intercourse with the world, begun to question the reality. When I have been for a few days lost in pleasing dissipation, I am always tempted to think that my inquiries have ended in error, and that I have suffered much, and suffered it in vain."

Imlac was delighted to find that the sage's understanding was breaking through its mists, and resolved to detain him from the planets till he should forget his task of ruling them, and reason should recover its original influence.

From this time the astronomer was received into familiar friendship, and partook of all their projects and pleasures: his respect kept him attentive, and the activity of Rasselas did not leave much time unengaged. Something was always to be done; the day was spent in making observations which furnished talk for the evening, and the evening was closed with a scheme for the morrow.

The sage confessed to Imlac, that since he had mingled in the gay tumults of life, and divided his hours by a succession of amusements, he found the conviction of his authority over the skies fade gradually from his mind, and began to trust less to an opinion which he never could prove to others, and which he now found subject to variation from causes in which reason had no part. "If I am accidentally left alone for a few hours," said he, "my inveterate persuasion rushes upon my soul, and my thoughts are chained down by some irresistible violence, but they are soon disentangled by the prince's conversation, and instantaneously released at the entrance of Pekuah. I am like a man habitually afraid of specters, who is set at ease by a lamp, and wonders at the dread which harassed him in the dark, yet, if his lamp be extinguished, feels again the terrors which he knows that when it is light he shall feel no more. But I am sometimes afraid lest I indulge my quiet by criminal negligence, and voluntarily forget the great charge with which I am entrusted. If I favor myself in a known error, or am determined by my own ease in a doubtful question of this importance, how dreadful is my crime!"

"No disease of the imagination," answered Imlac, "is so difficult of cure, as that which is complicated with the dread of guilt: fancy and conscience then act interchangeably upon us, and so often shift their places, that the illusions of one are not distinguished from the dictates of the other. If fancy presents images not moral or religious, the mind drives them away when they give it pain, but when melancholic<sup>6</sup> notions take the form of duty, they lay hold on the faculties without opposition, because we are afraid to exclude or banish them. For this reason the superstitious are often melancholy, and the melancholy almost always superstitious.

"But do not let the suggestions of timidity overpower your better reason: the danger of neglect can be but as the probability of the obligation, which, when you consider it with freedom, you find very little, and that little growing every day less. Open your heart to the influence of the light, which, from time to time, breaks in upon you: when scruples importune you, which you in your lucid moments know to be vain, do not stand to parley, but fly to business or to Pekuah, and keep this thought always prevalent, that you are only one atom of the mass of humanity, and have neither such virtue nor vice, as that you should be singled out for supernatural favors or afflictions."

6. Obsessive. According to Johnson's Dictionary, one definition of melancholy is "a kind of madness in which the mind is always fixed on one object."

Chapter 47. The Prince Enters, and Brings a New Topic

"All this," said the astronomer, "I have often thought, but my reason has been so long subjugated by an uncontrollable and overwhelming idea, that it durst not confide in its own decisions. I now see how fatally I betrayed my quiet, by suffering chimeras to prey upon me in secret; but melancholy shrinks from communication, and I never found a man before, to whom I could impart my troubles, though I had been certain of relief. I rejoice to find my own sentiments confirmed by yours, who are not easily deceived, and can have no motive or purpose to deceive. I hope that time and variety will dissipate the gloom that has so long surrounded me, and the latter part of my days will be spent in peace."

"Your learning and virtue," said Imlac, "may justly give you hopes."

Rasselas then entered with the princess and Pekuah, and inquired whether they had contrived any new diversion for the next day. "Such," said Nekayah, "is the state of life, that none are happy but by the anticipation of change: the change itself is nothing; when we have made it, the next wish is to change again. The world is not yet exhausted; let me see something tomorrow which I never saw before."

"Variety," said Rasselas, "is so necessary to content, that even the happy valley disgusted me by the recurrence of its luxuries; yet I could not forbear to reproach myself with impatience, when I saw the monks of St. Anthony support without complaint, a life, not of uniform delight, but uniform hardship."

"Those men," answered Imlac, "are less wretched in their silent convent than the Abyssinian princes in their prison of pleasure. Whatever is done by the monks is incited by an adequate and reasonable motive. Their labor supplies them with necessaries; it therefore cannot be omitted, and is certainly rewarded. Their devotion prepares them for another state, and reminds them of its approach, while it fits them for it. Their time is regularly distributed; one duty succeeds another, so that they are not left open to the distraction of unguided choice, nor lost in the shades of listless inactivity. There is a certain task to be performed at an appropriated hour; and their toils are cheerful, because they consider them as acts of piety, by which they are always advancing towards endless felicity."

"Do you think," said Nekayah, "that the monastic rule is a more holy and less imperfect state than any other? May not he equally hope for future happiness who converses openly with mankind, who succors the distressed by his charity, instructs the ignorant by his learning, and contributes by his industry to the general system of life; even though he should omit some of the mortifications which are practiced in the cloister, and allow himself such harmless delights as his condition may place within his reach?"

"This," said Imlac, "is a question which has long divided the wise, and perplexed the good. I am afraid to decide on either part. He that lives well in the world is better than he that lives well in a monastery. But perhaps everyone is not able to stem the temptations of public life; and if he cannot conquer, he may properly retreat. Some have little power to do good, and have likewise little strength to resist evil. Many are weary of their conflicts with adversity, and are willing to eject those passions which have long busied them in vain. And many are dismissed by age and diseases from the more laborious duties of society. In monasteries the weak and timorous may be happily sheltered, the weary may repose, and the penitent may meditate. Those retreats of prayer and contemplation have something so congenial to the mind of man, that, perhaps, there is scarcely one that does not purpose to close his life in pious abstraction with a few associates serious as himself."

"Such," said Pekuah, "has often been my wish, and I have heard the princess declare, that she should not willingly die in a crowd."

"The liberty of using harmless pleasures," proceeded Imlac, "will not be disputed; but it is still to be examined what pleasures are harmless. The evil of any pleasure that Nekayah can image is not in the act itself, but in its consequences. Pleasure, in itself harmless, may become mischievous, by endearing to us a state which we know to be transient and probatory,<sup>7</sup> and withdrawing our thoughts from that, of which every hour brings us nearer to the beginning, and of which no length of time will bring us to the end. Mortification is not virtuous in itself, nor has any other use, but that it disengages us from the allurements of sense. In the state of future perfection, to which we all aspire, there will be pleasure without danger, and security without restraint."

The princess was silent, and Rasselas, turning to the astronomer, asked him, whether he could not delay her retreat, by showing her something which she had not seen before.

"Your curiosity," said the sage, "has been so general, and your pursuit of knowledge so vigorous, that novelties are not now very easily to be found: but what you can no longer procure from the living may be given by the dead. Among the wonders of this country are the catacombs, or the ancient repositories, in which the bodies of the earliest generations were lodged, and where, by the virtue of the gums which embalmed them, they yet remain without corruption."

"I know not," said Rasselas, "what pleasure the sight of the catacombs can afford; but, since nothing else is offered, I am resolved to view them, and shall place this with many other things which I have done, because I would do something."

They hired a guard of horsemen, and the next day visited the catacombs. When they were about to descend into the sepulchral caves, "Pekuah," said the princess, "we are now again invading the habitations of the dead; I know that you will stay behind; let me find you safe when I return." "No, I will not be left," answered Pekuah; "I will go down between you and the prince."

They then all descended, and roved with wonder through the labyrinth of subterraneous passages, where the bodies were laid in rows on either side.

Chapter 48. Imlac Discourses on the Nature of the Soul

"What reason," said the prince, "can be given, why the Egyptians should thus expensively preserve those carcasses which some nations consume with fire, others lay to mingle with the earth, and all agree to remove from their sight, as soon as decent rites can be performed?"

"The original of ancient customs," said Imlac, "is commonly unknown; for the practice often continues when the cause has ceased; and concerning superstitious ceremonies it is vain to conjecture; for what reason did not dictate reason cannot explain. I have long believed that the practice of embalming arose only from tenderness to the remains of relations or friends, and to this opinion I am more inclined, because it seems impossible that this care should have been general: had all the dead been embalmed, their repositories must in time have been more spacious than the dwellings of the living. I suppose only the rich or honorable were secured from corruption, and the rest left to the course of nature.

7. Serving as a trial or test.

"But it is commonly supposed that the Egyptians believed the soul to live as long as the body continued undissolved, and therefore tried this method of eluding death."

"Could the wise Egyptians," said Nekayah, "think so grossly of the soul? If the soul could once survive its separation, what could it afterwards receive or suffer from the body?"

"The Egyptians would doubtless think erroneously," said the astronomer, "in the darkness of heathenism, and the first dawn of philosophy. The nature of the soul is still disputed amidst all our opportunities of clearer knowledge: some yet say, that it may be material, who, nevertheless, believe it to be immortal."

"Some," answered Imlac, "have indeed said that the soul is material, but I can scarcely believe that any man has thought it, who knew how to think; for all the conclusions of reason enforce the immateriality of mind, and all the notices of sense and investigations of science concur to prove the unconsciousness of matter.

"It was never supposed that cogitation is inherent in matter, or that every particle is a thinking being. Yet if any part of matter be devoid of thought, what part can we suppose to think? Matter can differ from matter only in form, density, bulk, motion, and direction of motion: to which of these, however varied or combined, can consciousness be annexed? To be round or square, to be solid or fluid, to be great or little, to be moved slowly or swiftly one way or another, are modes of material existence, all equally alien from the nature of cogitation. If matter be once without thought, it can only be made to think by some new modification, but all the modifications which it can admit are equally unconnected with cogitative powers."

"But the materialists," said the astronomer, "urge that matter may have qualities with which we are unacquainted."

"He who will determine," returned Imlac, "against that which he knows, because there may be something which he knows not; he that can set hypothetical possibility against acknowledged certainty, is not to be admitted among reasonable beings. All that we know of matter is, that matter is inert, senseless and lifeless; and if this conviction cannot be opposed but by referring us to something that we know not, we have all the evidence that human intellect can admit. If that which is known may be overruled by that which is unknown, no being, not omniscient, can arrive at certainty."

"Yet let us not," said the astronomer, "too arrogantly limit the Creator's power."

"It is no limitation of omnipotence," replied the poet, "to suppose that one thing is not consistent with another, that the same proposition cannot be at once true and false, that the same number cannot be even and odd, that cogitation cannot be conferred on that which is created incapable of cogitation."

"I know not," said Nekayah, "any great use of this question. Does that immateriality, which, in my opinion, you have sufficiently proved, necessarily include eternal duration?"

"Of immateriality," said Imlac, "our ideas are negative, and therefore obscure. Immateriality seems to imply a natural power of perpetual duration as a consequence of exemption from all causes of decay: whatever perishes, is destroyed by the solution of its contexture,<sup>8</sup> and separation of its parts; nor can we conceive how that which has no parts, and therefore admits no solution, can be naturally corrupted or impaired."

"I know not," said Rasselas, "how to conceive anything without extension: what is extended must have parts, and you allow, that whatever has parts may be destroyed."

"Consider your own conceptions," replied Imlac, "and the difficulty will be less. You will find substance without extension. An ideal form is no less real than material bulk: yet an ideal form has no extension. It is no less certain, when you think on a pyramid, that your mind possesses the idea of a pyramid, than that the pyramid itself is standing. What space does the idea of a pyramid occupy more than the idea of a grain of corn? or how can either idea suffer laceration? As is the effect such is the cause; as thought is, such is the power that thinks; a power impassive and indiscerptible."<sup>9</sup>

"But the Being," said Nekayah, "whom I fear to name, the Being which made the soul, can destroy it."

"He, surely, can destroy it," answered Imlac, "since, however unperishable, it receives from a superior nature its power of duration. That it will not perish by any inherent cause of decay, or principle of corruption, may be shown by philosophy; but philosophy can tell no more. That it will not be annihilated by him that made it, we must humbly learn from higher authority."

The whole assembly stood a while silent and collected. "Let us return," said Rasselas, "from this scene of mortality. How gloomy would be these mansions of the dead to him who did not know that he shall never die; that what now acts shall continue its agency, and what now thinks shall think on for ever. Those that lie here stretched before us, the wise and the powerful of ancient times, warn us to remember the shortness of our present state: they were, perhaps, snatched away while they were busy, like us, in the choice of life."

"To me," said the princess, "the choice of life is become less important; I hope hereafter to think only on the choice of eternity."

They then hastened out of the caverns, and, under the protection of their guard, returned to Cairo.

Chapter 49. The Conclusion, in Which Nothing Is Concluded

It was now the time of the inundation of the Nile: a few days after their visit to the catacombs, the river began to rise.

They were confined to their house. The whole region being under water gave them no invitation to any excursions, and being well supplied with materials for talk, they diverted themselves with comparisons of the different forms of life which they had observed, and with various schemes of happiness which each of them had formed.

Pekuah was never so much charmed with any place as the convent of St. Anthony, where the Arab restored her to the princess, and wished only to fill it with pious maidens, and to be made prioress of the order; she was weary of expectation and disgust, and would gladly be fixed in some unvariable state.

8. Dissolution of its structure.

9. Not to be separated.

1. Aversion.

The princess thought that, of all sublunary things, knowledge was the best: she desired first to learn all sciences, and then purposed to found a college of learned women, in which she would preside, that, by conversing with the old and educating the young, she might divide her time between the acquisition and communication of wisdom, and raise up for the next age models of prudence, and patterns of piety.

The prince desired a little kingdom, in which he might administer justice in his own person, and see all the parts of government with his own eyes; but he could never fix the limits of his dominion, and was always adding to the number of his subjects.

Imlac and the astronomer were contented to be driven along the stream of life, without directing their course to any particular port.

Of these wishes that they had formed, they well knew that none could be obtained. They deliberated a while what was to be done, and resolved, when the inundation should cease, to return to Abyssinia.<sup>2</sup>

And join both profit and delight in one.

—CREECH

The works of fiction with which the present generation seems more particularly delighted are such as exhibit life in its true state, diversified only by accidents that daily happen in the world, and influenced by passions and qualities which are really to be found in conversing with mankind.

This kind of writing may be termed, not improperly, the comedy of romance, and is to be conducted nearly by the rules of comic poetry. Its province is to bring about natural events by easy means, and to keep up curiosity without the help of wonder: it is therefore precluded from the machines<sup>1</sup> and expedients of the heroic romance, and can neither employ giants to snatch away a lady from the nuptial rites, nor knights to bring her back from captivity; it can neither bewilder its personages in deserts, nor lodge them in imaginary castles.

I remember a remark made by Scaliger upon Pontanus,<sup>2</sup> that all his writings are filled with the same images; and that if you take from him his lilies and his roses, his satyrs and his dryads, he will have nothing left that can be called poetry. In like manner, almost all the fictions of the last age will vanish if you deprive them of a hermit and a wood, a battle and a shipwreck.

Why this wild strain of imagination found reception so long in polite and learned ages, it is not easy to conceive; but we cannot wonder that while readers could be procured, the authors were willing to continue it; for when a man had by practice gained some fluency of language, he had no further care than to retire to his closet, let loose his invention, and heat his mind with incredibilities; a book was thus produced without fear of criticism, without the toil of study, without knowledge of nature, or acquaintance with life.

The task of our present writers is very different; it requires, together with that learning which is to be gained from books, that experience which can never be attained by solitary diligence, but must arise from general converse and accurate observation of the living world. Their performances have, as Horace expresses it, plus oneris quanto veniae minus,<sup>3</sup> little indulgence, and therefore more difficulty. They are engaged in portraits of which everyone knows the original, and can detect any deviation from exactness of resemblance. Other writings are safe, except from the malice of learning, but these are in danger from every common reader; as the slipper ill executed was censured by a shoemaker who happened to stop in his way at the Venus of Apelles.<sup>4</sup>

But the fear of not being approved as just copiers of human manners is not the most important concern that an author of this sort ought to have before him. These books are written chiefly to the young, the ignorant, and the idle, to whom they serve as lectures of conduct, and introductions into life. They are the entertainment of minds unfurnished with ideas, and therefore easily susceptible of impressions; not fixed by principles, and therefore easily following the current of fancy; not informed by experience, and consequently open to every false suggestion and partial account.

That the highest degree of reverence should be paid to youth, and that nothing indecent should be suffered to approach their eyes or ears, are precepts extorted by sense and virtue from an ancient writer by no means eminent for chastity of thought.<sup>5</sup> The same kind, though not the same degree, of caution, is required in everything which is laid before them, to secure them from unjust prejudices, perverse opinions, and incongruous combinations of images.

In the romances formerly written, every transaction and sentiment was so remote from all that passes among men that the reader was in very little danger of making any applications to himself; the virtues and crimes were equally beyond his sphere of activity; and he amused himself with heroes and with traitors, deliverers and persecutors, as with beings of another species, whose actions were regulated upon motives of their own, and who had neither faults nor excellencies in common with himself.

But when an adventurer is leveled with the rest of the world, and acts in such scenes of the universal drama as may be the lot of any other man, young spectators fix their eyes upon him with closer attention, and hope, by observing his behavior and success, to regulate their own practices when they shall be engaged in the like part.

For this reason these familiar histories may perhaps be made of greater use than the solemnities of professed morality, and convey the knowledge of vice and virtue with more efficacy than axioms and definitions. But if the power of example is so great as to take possession of the memory by a kind of violence, and produce effects almost without the intervention of the will, care ought to be taken that when the choice is unrestrained, the best examples only should be exhibited; and that which is likely to operate so strongly should not be mischievous or uncertain in its effects.

The chief advantage which these fictions have over real life is that their authors are at liberty, though not to invent, yet to select objects, and to cull from the mass of mankind those individuals upon which the attention ought most to be employed; as a diamond, though it cannot be made, may be polished by art, and placed in such situation as to display that luster which before was buried among common stones.

It is justly considered as the greatest excellency of art to imitate nature; but it is necessary to distinguish those parts of nature which are most proper for imitation: greater care is still required in representing life, which is so often discolored by passion or deformed by wickedness. If the world be promiscuously<sup>6</sup> described, I cannot see of what use it can be to read the account; or why it may not be as safe to turn the eye immediately upon mankind as upon a mirror which shows all that presents itself without discrimination.

It is therefore not a sufficient vindication of a character that it is drawn as it appears, for many characters ought never to be drawn; nor of a narrative that the train of events is agreeable to observation and experience, for that observation which is called knowledge of the world will be found much more frequently to make men cunning than good. The purpose of these writings is surely not only to show mankind, but to provide that they may be seen hereafter with less hazard; to teach the means of avoiding the snares which are laid by Treachery for Innocence, without infusing any wish for that superiority with which the betrayer flatters his vanity; to give the power of counteracting fraud without the temptation to practice it; to initiate youth by mock encounters in the art of necessary defense, and to increase prudence without impairing virtue.

Many writers, for the sake of following nature, so mingle good and bad qualities in their principal personages that they are both equally conspicuous; and as we accompany them through their adventures with delight, and are led by degrees to interest ourselves in their favor, we lose the abhorrence of their faults because they do not hinder our pleasure, or perhaps regard them with some kindness for being united with so much merit.<sup>7</sup>

There have been men indeed splendidly wicked, whose endowments threw a brightness on their crimes, and whom scarce any villainy made perfectly detestable because they never could be wholly divested of their excellencies; but such have been in all ages the great corrupters of the world, and their resemblance ought no more to be preserved than the art of murdering without pain.

Some have advanced, without due attention to the consequences of this notion, that certain virtues have their correspondent faults, and therefore that to exhibit either apart is to deviate from probability. Thus men are observed by Swift to be "grateful in the same degree as they are resentful." This principle, with others of the same kind, supposes man to act from a brute impulse, and pursue a certain degree of inclination without any choice of the object; for, otherwise, though it should be allowed that gratitude and resentment arise

6. Indiscriminately.

7. Johnson is probably thinking of such popular novels as Tobias Smollett's Roderick Random from the same constitution of the passions, it follows not that they will be equally indulged when reason is consulted; yet, unless that consequence be admitted, this sagacious maxim becomes an empty sound, without any relation to practice or to life.

(1748) and Henry Fielding's Tom Jones (1749), as opposed to the model of virtue provided by Samuel Richardson's Clarissa (1747-48).

Nor is it evident that even the first motions to these effects are always in the same proportion. For pride, which produces quickness of resentment, will obstruct gratitude by unwillingness to admit that inferiority which obligation implies; and it is very unlikely that he who cannot think he receives a favor will acknowledge or repay it.

It is of the utmost importance to mankind that positions of this tendency should be laid open and confuted; for while men consider good and evil as springing from the same root, they will spare the one for the sake of the other, and in judging, if not of others at least of themselves, will be apt to estimate their virtues by their vices. To this fatal error all those will contribute who confound the colors of right and wrong, and, instead of helping to settle their boundaries, mix them with so much art that no common mind is able to disunite them.

In narratives where historical veracity has no place, I cannot discover why there should not be exhibited the most perfect idea of virtue; of virtue not angelical, nor above probability (for what we cannot credit, we shall never imitate), but the highest and purest that humanity can reach, which, exercised in such trials as the various revolutions of things shall bring upon it, may, by conquering some calamities and enduring others, teach us what we may hope, and what we can perform. Vice (for vice is necessary to be shown) should always disgust; nor should the graces of gaiety, nor the dignity of courage, be so united with it as to reconcile it to the mind. Wherever it appears, it should raise hatred by the malignity of its practices, and contempt by the meanness of its stratagems: for while it is supported by either parts<sup>8</sup> or spirit, it will be seldom heartily abhorred. The Roman tyrant was content to be hated if he was but feared;<sup>9</sup> and there are thousands of the readers of romances willing to be thought wicked if they may be allowed to be wits. It is therefore to be steadily inculcated that virtue is the highest proof of understanding, and the only solid basis of greatness; and that vice is the natural consequence of narrow thoughts; that it begins in mistake, and ends in ignominy.

9. The emperor Tiberius (see Suetonius's Lives of the Caesars).

All joy or sorrow for the happiness or calamities of others is produced by an act of the imagination, that realizes the event, however fictitious, or approximates it,<sup>1</sup> however remote, by placing us, for a time, in the condition of him whose fortune we contemplate; so that we feel, while the deception lasts, whatever motions would be excited by the same good or evil happening to ourselves.

Our passions are therefore more strongly moved, in proportion as we can more readily adopt the pains or pleasure proposed to our minds, by recognizing them as once our own, or considering them as naturally incident to our state of life. It is not easy for the most artful writer to give us an interest in happiness or misery, which we think ourselves never likely to feel, and with which we have never yet been made acquainted. Histories of the downfall of kingdoms, and revolutions of empires, are read with great tranquility; the imperial tragedy pleases common auditors only by its pomp of ornament, and grandeur of ideas; and the man whose faculties have been engrossed by business, and whose heart never fluttered but at the rise or fall of stocks, wonders how the attention can be seized, or the affections agitated, by a tale of love.

Those parallel circumstances, and kindred images to which we readily conform our minds, are, above all other writings, to be found in narratives of the lives of particular persons; and therefore no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than biography, since none can be more delightful or more useful, none can more certainly enchain the heart by irresistible interest, or more widely diffuse instruction to every diversity of condition.

The general and rapid narratives of history, which involve a thousand fortunes in the business of a day, and complicate<sup>2</sup> innumerable incidents in one great transaction, afford few lessons applicable to private life, which derives its comforts and its wretchedness from the right or wrong management of things, which nothing but their frequency makes considerable, Parva si non fiunt quotidie, says Pliny,<sup>3</sup> and which can have no place in those relations which never descend below the consultation of senates, the motions of armies, and the schemes of conspirators.

I have often thought that there has rarely passed a life of which a judicious and faithful narrative would not be useful. For, not only every man has in the mighty mass of the world great numbers in the same condition with himself, to whom his mistakes and miscarriages, escapes and expedients, would be of immediate and apparent use; but there is such a uniformity in the state of man, considered apart from adventitious and separable decorations and disguises, that there is scarce any possibility of good or ill, but is common to humankind. A great part of the time of those who are placed at the greatest distance by fortune, or by temper, must unavoidably pass in the same manner; and though, when the claims of nature are satisfied, caprice, and vanity, and accident, begin to produce discriminations and peculiarities, yet the eye is not very heedful or quick, which cannot discover the same causes still<sup>4</sup> terminating their influence in the same effects, though sometimes accelerated, sometimes retarded, or perplexed by multiplied combinations. We are all prompted by the same motives, all deceived by the same fallacies, all animated by hope, obstructed by danger, entangled by desire, and seduced by pleasure.

3. Pliny the Younger's Epistles 3.1. Johnson translates the phrase in the preceding clause.

4. Always.

It is frequently objected to relations of particular lives, that they are not distinguished by any striking or wonderful vicissitudes. The scholar who passed his life among his books, the merchant who conducted only his own affairs, the priest whose sphere of action was not extended beyond that of his duty, are considered as no proper objects of public regard, however they might have excelled in their several stations, whatever might have been their learning, integrity, and piety. But this notion arises from false measures of excellence and dignity, and must be eradicated by considering, that in the esteem of uncorrupted reason, what is of most use is of most value.

It is, indeed, not improper to take honest advantages of prejudice, and to gain attention by a celebrated name; but the business of the biographer is often to pass slightly over those performances and incidents, which produce vulgar greatness, to lead the thoughts into domestic privacies, and display the minute details of daily life, where exterior appendages are cast aside, and men excel each other only by prudence and by virtue. The account of Thuanus<sup>5</sup> is, with great propriety, said by its author to have been written, that it might lay open to posterity the private and familiar character of that man, cujus ingenium et candorevi ex ipsius scriptis sunt olim semper miraturi, whose candor and genius will to the end of time be by his writings preserved in admiration.

There are many invisible circumstances which, whether we read as inquirers after natural or moral knowledge, whether we intend to enlarge our science, or increase our virtue, are more important than public occurrences. Thus Sallust, the great master of nature, has not forgot, in his account of Catiline,<sup>6</sup> to remark that his walk was now quick, and again slow, as an indication of a mind revolving something with violent commotion. Thus the story of Melancthon<sup>7</sup> affords a striking lecture on the value of time, by informing us that when he made an appointment, he expected not only the hour, but the minute to be fixed, that the day might not run out in the idleness of suspense; and all the plans and enterprises of De Witt are now of less importance to the world, than that part of his personal character, which represents him as careful of his health, and negligent of his life.<sup>8</sup>

But biography has often been allotted to writers who seem very little acquainted with the nature of their task, or very negligent about the performance. They rarely afford any other account than might be collected from public papers, but imagine themselves writing a life when they exhibit a chronological series of actions or preferments; and so little regard the manners or behavior of their heroes, that more knowledge may be gained of a man's real character, by a short conversation with one of his servants, than from a formal and studied narrative, begun with his pedigree, and ended with his funeral.

If now and then they condescend to inform the world of particular facts, they are not always so happy as to select the most important. I know not well what advantage posterity can receive from the only circumstance by which Tickell has distinguished Addison from the rest of mankind, the irregularity of his pulse:<sup>9</sup> nor can I think myself overpaid for the time spent in reading the life of Malherbe, by being enabled to relate, after the learned biographer,<sup>1</sup> that

5. Jacques-Auguste de Thou (1553–1617), an important French historian, of whom Nicholas Rigault wrote a brief biography, a sentence of which Johnson quotes and translates below.

6. Sallust, a Roman historian of the 1st century B.C.E., wrote an account of Catiline's conspiracy against the Roman state.

7. Camerarius wrote a life of Melancthon, a German theologian of the 16th century.

8. Sir William Temple, characterizing the Dutch statesman John De Witt.

9. From Thomas Tickell's preface to Addison's Works (1721).

1. The life of the French poet Francois de Malherbe (1555–1628) was written by Honorat de Racan.

Malherbe had two predominant opinions; one, that the looseness of a single woman might destroy all her boast of ancient descent; the other, that the French beggars made use very improperly and barbarously of the phrase noble gentleman, because either word included the sense of both.

There are, indeed, some natural reasons why these narratives are often written by such as were not likely to give much instruction or delight, and why most accounts of particular persons are barren and useless. If a life be delayed till interest and envy are at an end, we may hope for impartiality, but must expect little intelligence;<sup>2</sup> for the incidents which give excellence to biography are of a volatile and evanescent land, such as soon escape the memory, and are rarely transmitted by tradition. We know how few can portray a living acquaintance, except by his most prominent and observable particularities, and the grosser features of his mind; and it may be easily imagined how much of this little knowledge may be lost in imparting it, and how soon a succession of copies will lose all resemblance of the original.

If the biographer writes from personal knowledge, and makes haste to gratify the public curiosity, there is danger lest his interest, his fear, his gratitude, or his tenderness, overpower his fidelity, and tempt him to conceal, if not to invent. There are many who think it an act of piety to hide the faults or failings of their friends, even when they can no longer suffer by their detection; we therefore see whole ranks of characters adorned with uniform panegyric, and not to be known from one another, but by extrinsic and casual circumstances. "Let me remember," says Hale, "when I find myself inclined to pity a criminal, that there is likewise a pity due to the country."<sup>3</sup> If we owe regard to the memory of the dead, there is yet more respect to be paid to knowledge, to virtue, and to truth.

A Dictionary of the English Language Before Johnson, no standard dictionary of the English language existed. The lack had troubled speakers of English for some time, both because Italian and French academies had produced major dictionaries of their own tongues and because, in the absence of any authority, English seemed likely to change utterly from one generation to another. Many eighteenth-century authors feared that their own language would soon become obsolete: as Alexander Pope wrote in An Essay on Criticism,

Our sons their fathers' failing language see,
And such as Chaucer is, shall Dryden be.

A dictionary could help retard such change, and commercially it would be a book that everyone would need to buy. In 1746 a group of London publishers commissioned Johnson, still an unknown author, to undertake the project. He hoped to finish it in three years; it took him nine. But the quantity and quality of work he accomplished, aided only by six part-time assistants, made him famous as "Dictionary Johnson." The Dictionary remained a standard reference book for one hundred years.

Johnson's achievement is notable in three respects: its size (forty thousand words), the wealth of illustrative quotations, and the excellence of the definitions. No earlier English dictionary rivaled the scope of Johnson's two large folio volumes. About 114,000 quotations, gathered from the best English writers from Sidney to the eighteenth century, exemplify the usage of words as well as their meanings. Above all, it was the definitions, however, that established the authority of Johnson's Dictionary.

2. Information.

3. From Gilbert Burnet's Life and Death of Sir Matthew Hale (1682).

A small selection is only too likely to concentrate on a few amusing or notorious definitions, but the great majority are full, clear, and totally free from eccentricity. Indeed, many of them are still repeated in modern dictionaries. Language, Johnson knew, cannot be fixed once and for all; many of the words he defines have radically changed meaning since the eighteenth century. Yet Johnson did more than any other person of his time to preserve the ideal of a standard English.

From A Dictionary of the English Language

From Preface

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labor, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected that the stones which form the dome of a temple should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having labored it with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those who have been persuaded to think well of my design will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while;<sup>1</sup> but now begin to fear that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language and secure it from corruption and decay, that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, or clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy;<sup>2</sup> the style of Amelot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un pen passe;<sup>1</sup> and no Italian will maintain that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.<sup>4</sup>

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare: but there are other causes of change, which,

1. Johnson's Plan (1747) had called for "a dictionary by which the pronunciation of our language may be fixed, and its attainment facilitated: by which its purity may be preserved, its use ascertained, and its duration lengthened."

2. The French academy, founded to purify the French language, had produced a dictionary in 1694; but revisions were necessary within a few years.

3. A bit old-fashioned (French). Le Courayer's translation (1736) of Father Paolo Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent superseded Amelot's (1683).

4. Like Boccaccio (1313–1375) and Machiavelli (1469–1527), Annibale Caro (1507–1566) was a classic Italian stylist whose work had preceded the dictionary published in 1612 by the Italian academy.

though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superior to human resistance as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence<sup>5</sup> of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavor to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers<sup>6</sup> on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniencies of life; either without books, or, like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labor of the other. Those who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas, and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences, a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense; the geometri- cian will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero, and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatic delays.<sup>7</sup> Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes<sup>8</sup> of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the cur- rent sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will at one time or other, by public infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language,<sup>9</sup> allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it?

and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once by disuse become unfamiliar, and by unfamiliarity displeasing.

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both, and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste or negligence, refinement or affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotic expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabric of the tongue continue the same, but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order<sup>1</sup> of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependence multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavor with all their influence to stop the license of translators, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence, as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated: tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labor of years, to the honor of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology without a contest to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors: whether I shall add anything by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time. Much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me; but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if by my assistance foreign nations, and distant ages, gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers of truth; if my labors afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.<sup>2</sup>

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective; and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavored well. That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert;<sup>3</sup> who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labors of the anvil and the mine;<sup>4</sup> that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprise vigilance, slight avocations<sup>5</sup> will reduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts tomorrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great;<sup>6</sup> not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academic bowers, but amidst inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow: and it may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprised in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive; if the aggregated knowledge and cooperating diligence of the Italian academicians did not secure them from the censure of Beni;<sup>7</sup> if the embodied critics of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its economy,<sup>8</sup> and give their second edition another form, I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which, if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave,<sup>9</sup> and success and miscarriage are empty sounds: I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquility, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.

The Preface to Shakespeare This is the finest piece of Shakespeare criticism in the eighteenth century; it culminates a critical tradition that began with John Dryden's remarks on Shakespeare and continued as the plays were edited by Nicholas Rowe, Alexander Pope, Lewis Theobald, and William Warburton. Johnson addresses the standard topics: Shakespeare is the poet of nature, not learning; the creator of characters who spring to life; and a writer whose works express the full range of human passions. But the Preface also takes a fresh look not only at the plays but at the first principles of criticism. Resisting "bardolatry"—uncritical worship of Shakespeare—Johnson points out his faults as well as his virtues and finds that his truth to life, or "just representations of general nature," surpasses that of all other modern writers. The Preface is most original when it attacks the long-standing critical reverence for the unities of time and place. What seems real on the stage, Johnson argues, does not depend on artificial rules but on what the mind is willing to imagine.

Johnson's edition of Shakespeare also contained footnotes and brief introductions to each of the plays. Reprinted here are his afterwords to Twelfth Night and King Lear.

From The Preface to Shakespeare

[SHAKESPEARE'S EXCELLENCE. GENERAL NATURE]

That praises are without reason lavished on the dead, and that the honors due only to excellence are paid to antiquity, is a complaint likely to be always continued by those who, being able to add nothing to truth, hope for eminence from the heresies of paradox; or those who, being forced by disappointment upon consolatory expedients, are willing to hope from posterity what the present age refuses, and flatter themselves that the regard which is yet denied by envy will be at last bestowed by time.

Antiquity, like every other quality that attracts the notice of mankind, has undoubtedly votaries that reverence it not from reason but from prejudice. Some seem to admire indiscriminately whatever has been long preserved, without considering that time has sometimes cooperated with chance; all perhaps are more willing to honor past than present excellence; and the mind contemplates genius through the shades of age, as the eye surveys the sun through artificial opacity. The great contention of criticism is to find the faults of the moderns and the beauties of the ancients. While an author is yet living we estimate his powers by his worst performance; and when he is dead we rate them by his best.

To works, however, of which the excellence is not absolute and definite, but gradual and comparative; to works not raised upon principles demonstrative and scientific, but appealing wholly to observation and experience, no other test can be applied than length of duration and continuance of esteem. What mankind have long possessed they have often examined and compared; and if they persist to value the possession, it is because frequent comparisons have confirmed opinion in its favor. As among the works of nature no man can properly call a river deep or a mountain high, without the knowledge of many mountains and many rivers; so in the productions of genius, nothing can be styled excellent till it has been compared with other works of the same kind. Demonstration<sup>1</sup> immediately displays its power and has nothing to hope or fear from the flux of years; but works tentative and experimental must be estimated by their proportion to the general and collective ability of man, as it is discovered in a long succession of endeavors. Of the first building that was raised, it might be with certainty determined that it was round or square, but whether it was spacious or lofty must have been referred to time. The Pythagorean scale of numbers<sup>2</sup> was at once discovered to be perfect; but the poems of Homer we yet know not to transcend the common limits of human intelligence, but by remarking that nation after nation, and century after centure, has been able to do little more than transpose his incidents, new name his characters, and paraphrase his sentiments.

The reverence due to writings that have long subsisted arises, therefore, not from any credulous confidence in the superior wisdom of past ages, or gloomy persuasion of the degeneracy of mankind, but is the consequence of acknowledged and indubitable positions, that what has been longest known has been most considered, and what is most considered is best understood.

The poet of whose works I have undertaken the revision may now begin to assume the dignity of an ancient and claim the privilege of established fame and prescriptive veneration. He has long outlived his century, the term commonly fixed as the test of literary merit.<sup>3</sup> Whatever advantages he might once derive from personal allusions, local customs, or temporary opinions, have for many years been lost; and every topic of merriment or motive of sorrow which the modes of artificial life afforded him now only obscure the scenes which they once illuminated. The effects of favor and competition are at an end; the tradition of his friendships and his enmities has perished; his works support no opinion with arguments nor supply any faction with invectives; they can neither indulge vanity nor gratify malignity; but are read without any other reason than the desire of pleasure, and are therefore praised only as pleasure is obtained; yet, thus unassisted by interest or passion, they have passed through variations of taste and changes of manners, and, as they devolved from one generation to another, have received new honors at every transmission.

But because human judgment, though it be gradually gaining upon certainty, never becomes infallible, and approbation, though long continued, may yet be only the approbation of prejudice or fashion, it is proper to inquire by what peculiarities of excellence Shakespeare has gained and kept the favor of his countrymen.

Nothing can please many, and please long, but just representations of general nature. Particular manners can be known to few, and therefore few only can judge how nearly they are copied. The irregular combinations of fanciful invention may delight awhile by that novelty of which the common satiety of life sends us all in quest; but the pleasures of sudden wonder are soon exhausted, and the mind can only repose on the stability of truth.

Shakespeare is, above all writers, at least above all modern writers, the poet of nature, the poet that holds up to his readers a faithful mirror of manners and of life. His characters are not modified by the customs of particular places, unpracticed by the rest of the world; by the peculiarities of studies or professions, which can operate but upon small numbers; or by the accidents of transient fashions or temporary opinions: they are the genuine progeny of common humanity, such as the world will always supply and observation will always find. His persons act and speak by the influence of those general passions and principles by which all minds are agitated and the whole system of life is continued in motion. In the writings of other poets a character is too often an individual: in those of Shakespeare it is commonly a species.

It is from this wide extension of design that so much instruction is derived. It is this which fills the plays of Shakespeare with practical axioms and domestic wisdom. It was said of Euripides<sup>4</sup> that every verse was a precept; and it may be said of Shakespeare that from his works may be collected a system of civil and economical prudence. Yet his real power is not shown in the splendor of particular passages, but by the progress of his fable<sup>5</sup> and the tenor of his dialogue; and he that tries to recommend him by select quotations will succeed like the pedant in Hierocles<sup>6</sup> who, when he offered his house to sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen.

It will not easily be imagined how much Shakespeare excels in accommodating his sentiments to real life but by comparing him with other authors. It was observed of the ancient schools of declamation that the more diligently they were frequented, the more was the student disqualified for the world, because he found nothing there which he should ever meet in any other place. The same remark may be applied to every stage but that of Shakespeare. The theater, when it is under any other direction, is peopled by such characters as were never seen, conversing in a language which was never heard, upon topics which will never arise in the commerce of mankind. But the dialogue of this author is often so evidently determined by the incident which produces it, and is pursued with so much ease and simplicity, that it seems scarcely to claim the merit of fiction, but to have been gleaned by diligent selection out of common conversation and common occurrences.

Upon every other stage the universal agent is love, by whose power all good and evil is distributed and every action quickened or retarded. To bring a lover, a lady, and a rival into the fable; to entangle them in contradictory obligations, perplex them with oppositions of interest, and harass them with violence of desires inconsistent with each other; to make them meet in rapture, and part in agony; to fill their mouths with hyperbolic joy and outrageous sorrow; to distress them as nothing human ever was distressed; to deliver them as nothing human ever was delivered, is the business of a modern dramatist. For this, probability is violated, life is misrepresented, and language is depraved. But love is only one of many passions; and as it has no great influence upon the sum of life, it has little operation in the dramas of a poet who caught his ideas from the living world and exhibited only what he saw before him. He knew that any other passion, as it was regular or exorbitant, was a cause of happiness or calamity.

Characters thus ample and general were not easily discriminated and preserved; yet perhaps no poet ever kept his personages more distinct from each other. I will not say with Pope that every speech may be assigned to the proper speaker,<sup>7</sup> because many speeches there are which have nothing characteristic; but perhaps though some may be equally adapted to every person, it will be difficult to find that any can be properly transferred from the present possessor to another claimant. The choice is right when there is reason for choice.

Other dramatists can only gain attention by hyperbolic or aggravated characters, by fabulous and unexampled excellence or depravity, as the writers of barbarous romances invigorated the reader by a giant and a dwarf; and he that should form his expectations of human affairs from the play or from the tale would be equally deceived. Shakespeare has no heroes; his scenes are occupied only by men, who act and speak as the reader thinks that he should himself have spoken or acted on the same occasion; even where the agency is supernatural, the dialogue is level with life. Other writers disguise the most natural passions and most frequent incidents so that he who contemplates them in the book will not know them in the world: Shakespeare approximates<sup>8</sup> the remote, and familiarizes the wonderful; the event which he represents will not happen, but, if it were possible, its effects would probably be such as he has assigned; and it may be said that he has not only shown human nature as it acts in real exigencies, but as it would be found in trials to which it cannot be exposed.

This therefore is the praise of Shakespeare, that his drama is the mirror of life; that he who has mazed his imagination in following the phantoms which other writers raise up before him, may here be cured of his delirious ecstasies by reading human sentiments in human language, by scenes from which a hermit may estimate the transactions of the world, and a confessor predict the progress of the passions.

[SHAKESPEARE'S FAULTS. THE THREE DRAMATIC UNITIES]

Shakespeare with his excellencies has likewise faults, and faults sufficient to obscure and overwhelm any other merit. I shall show them in the proportion in which they appear to me, without envious malignity or superstitious veneration. No question can be more innocently discussed than a dead poet's pretensions to renown; and little regard is due to that bigotry which sets candor<sup>9</sup> higher than truth.

His first defect is that to which may be imputed most of the evil in books or in men. He sacrifices virtue to convenience, and is so much more careful to please than to instruct that he seems to write without any moral purpose. From his writings indeed a system of social duty may be selected, for he that thinks reasonably must think morally, but his precepts and axioms drop casually from him; he makes no just distribution of good or evil, nor is always careful to show in the virtuous a disapprobation of the wicked; he carries his persons indifferently through right and wrong, and at the close dismisses them without further care, and leaves their examples to operate by chance. This fault the barbarity of his age cannot extenuate; for it is always a writer's duty to make the world better, and justice is a virtue independent on time or place.

The plots are often so loosely formed that a very slight consideration may improve them, and so carelessly pursued that he seems not always fully to comprehend his own design. He omits opportunities of instructing or delighting which the train of his story seems to force upon him, and apparently rejects those exhibitions which would be more affecting for the sake of those which are more easy.

It may be observed that in many of his plays the latter part is evidently neglected. When he found himself near the end of his work, and in view of his reward, he shortened the labor to snatch the profit. He therefore remits his efforts where he should most vigorously exert them, and his catastrophe is probably produced or imperfectly represented.

He had no regard to distinction of time or place, but gives to one age or nation, without scruple, the customs, institutions, and opinions of another, at the expense not only of likelihood but of possibility. These faults Pope has endeavored, with more zeal than judgment, to transfer to his imagined interpolators. We need not wonder to find Hector quoting Aristotle, when we see the loves of Theseus and Hippolyta combined with the Gothic mythology of fairies.<sup>1</sup> Shakespeare, indeed, was not the only violator of chronology, for in the same age Sidney, who wanted not the advantages of learning, has, in his Arcadia, confounded the pastoral with the feudal times, the days of innocence, quiet, and security with those of turbulence, violence, and adventure.

In his comic scenes he is seldom very successful when he engages his characters in reciprocations of smartness and contests of sarcasm; their jests are commonly gross, and their pleasantry licentious; neither his gentlemen nor his ladies have much delicacy, nor are sufficiently distinguished from his clowns<sup>2</sup> by any appearance of refined manners. Whether he represented the real conversation of his time is not easy to determine: the reign of Elizabeth is commonly supposed to have been a time of stateliness, formality, and reserve; yet perhaps the relaxations of that severity were not very elegant. There must, however, have been always some modes of gaiety preferable to others, and a writer ought to choose the best.

In tragedy his performance seems constantly to be worse as his labor is more. The effusions of passion, which exigence forces out, are for the most part striking and energetic; but whenever he solicits his invention, or strains his faculties, the offspring of his throes is tumor,<sup>3</sup> meanness, tediousness, and obscurity.

In narration he affects a disproportionate pomp of diction and a wearisome train of circumlocution, and tells the incident imperfectly in many words which might have been more plainly delivered in few. Narration in dramatic poetry is naturally tedious, as it is unanimated and inactive, and obstructs the progress of the action; it should therefore always be rapid and enlivened by frequent interruption. Shakespeare found it an encumbrance, and instead of lightening it by brevity, endeavored to recommend it by dignity and splendor.

His declamations or set speeches are commonly cold and weak, for his power was the power of nature; when he endeavored, like other tragic writers, to catch opportunities of amplification and, instead of inquiring what the occasion demanded, to show how much his stores of knowledge could supply, he seldom escapes without the pity or resentment of his reader.

It is incident to him to be now and then entangled with an unwieldy sentiment which he cannot well express, and will not reject; he struggles with it awhile, and, if it continues stubborn, comprises it in words such as occur, and leaves it to be disentangled and evolved<sup>4</sup> by those who have more leisure to bestow upon it.

Not that always where the language is intricate the thought is subtle, or the image always great where the line is bulky; the equality of words to things is very often neglected, and trivial sentiments and vulgar<sup>5</sup> ideas disappoint the attention, to which they are recommended by sonorous epithets and swelling figures.

But the admirers of this great poet have most reason to complain when he approaches nearest to his highest excellence, and seems fully resolved to sink them in dejection and mollify them with tender emotions by the fall of greatness, the danger of innocence, or the crosses of love. What he does best, he soon ceases to do. He is not long soft and pathetic without some idle conceit or contemptible equivocation. He no sooner begins to move than he counteracts himself; and terror and pity, as they are rising in the mind, are checked and blasted by sudden frigidity.

A quibble<sup>6</sup> is to Shakespeare what luminous vapors are to the traveler: he follows it at all adventures; it is sure to lead him out of his way, and sure to engulf him in the mire. It has some malignant power over his mind, and its fascinations are irresistible. Whatever be the dignity or profundity of his disquisitions, whether he be enlarging knowledge or exalting affection, whether he be amusing<sup>7</sup> attention with incidents, or enchaining it in suspense, let but a quibble spring up before him, and he leaves his work unfinished. A quibble is the golden apple for which he will always turn aside from his career<sup>8</sup> or stoop from his elevation. A quibble, poor and barren as it is, gave him such delight that he was content to purchase it by the sacrifice of reason, propriety, and truth. A quibble was to him the fatal Cleopatra for which he lost the world, and was content to lose it.

It will be thought strange that in enumerating the defects of this writer, I have not yet mentioned his neglect of the unities; his violation of those laws which have been instituted and established by the joint authority of poets and critics.

For his other deviations from the art of writing, I resign him to critical justice without making any other demand in his favor than that which must be indulged to all human excellence: that his virtues be rated with his failings. But from the censure which this irregularity may bring upon him I shall, with due reverence to that learning which I must oppose, adventure to try how I can defend him.

His histories, being neither tragedies nor comedies, are not subject to any of their laws; nothing more is necessary to all the praise which they expect than that the changes of action be so prepared as to be understood; that the incidents be various and affecting, and the characters consistent, natural, and distinct. No other unity is intended, and therefore none is to be sought.

In his other works he has well enough preserved the unity of action. He has not, indeed, an intrigue regularly perplexed and regularly unraveled: he does not endeavor to hide his design only to discover it, for this is seldom the order of real events, and Shakespeare is the poet of nature: but his plan has commonly what Aristotle requires,<sup>9</sup> a beginning, a middle, and an end; one event is concatenated with another, and the conclusion follows by easy consequence. There are, perhaps, some incidents that might be spared, as in other poets there is much talk that only fills up time upon the stage; but the general system makes gradual advances, and the end of the play is the end of expectation.

To the unities of time and place he has shown no regard; and perhaps a nearer view of the principles on which they stand will diminish their value and withdraw from them the veneration which, from the time of Corneille,<sup>1</sup> they have very generally received, by discovering that they have given more trouble to the poet than pleasure to the auditor.

8. Course of action; the ground on which a race is run. In Greek legend Atalanta refused to marry any man who could not defeat her in a foot race.

Hippomenes won her by dropping, as he ran, three of the golden apples of the Hesperides, which she paused to pick up.

9. Poetics 7.

1. Pierre Corneille (1606-1684), the French playwright, discussed the unities in his Discours des trois unites (1660).

The necessity of observing the unities of time and place arises from the supposed necessity of making the drama credible. The critics hold it impossible that an action of months or years can be possibly believed to pass in three hours; or that the spectator can suppose himself to sit in the theater while ambassadors go and return between distant kings, while armies are levied and towns besieged, while an exile wanders and returns, or till he whom they saw courting his mistress shall lament the untimely fall of his son. The mind revolts from evident falsehood, and fiction loses its force when it departs from the resemblance of reality.

From the narrow limitation of time necessarily arises the contraction of place. The spectator who knows that he saw the first act at Alexandria cannot suppose that he sees the next at Rome, at a distance to which not the dragons of Medea<sup>2</sup> could, in so short a time, have transported him; he knows with certainty that he has not changed his place; and he knows that place cannot change itself, that what was a house cannot become a plain, that what was Thebes can never be Persepolis.

Such is the triumphant language with which a critic exults over the misery of an irregular poet, and exults commonly without resistance or reply. It is time, therefore, to tell him by the authority of Shakespeare that he assumes, as an unquestionable principle, a position which, while his breath is forming it into words, his understanding pronounces to be false. It is false that any representation is mistaken for reality; that any dramatic fable in its materiality was ever credible or, for a single moment, was ever credited.

The objection arising from the impossibility of passing the first hour at Alexandria and the next at Rome supposes that when the play opens the spectator really imagines himself at Alexandria, and believes that his walk to the theater has been a voyage to Egypt, and that he lives in the days of Antony and Cleopatra. Surely he that imagines this may imagine more. He that can take the stage at one time for the palace of the Ptolemies may take it in half an hour for the promontory of Actium. Delusion, if delusion be admitted, has no certain limitation; if the spectator can be once persuaded that his old acquaintances are Alexander and Caesar, that a room illuminated with candles is the plain of Pharsalia or the bank of Granicus, he is in a state of elevation above the reach of reason or of truth, and from the heights of empyrean poetry may despise the circumscriptions of terrestrial nature. There is no reason why a mind thus wandering in ecstasies<sup>3</sup> should count the clock, or why an hour should not be a century in that calenture<sup>3</sup> of the brain that can make the stage a field.

The truth is that the spectators are always in their senses, and know, from the first act to the last, that the stage is only a stage, and that the players are only players. They came to hear a certain number of lines recited with just gesture and elegant modulation. The lines relate to some action, and an action must be in some place; but the different actions that complete a story may be in places very remote from each other; and where is the absurdity of allowing that space to represent first Athens, and then Sicily, which was always known to be neither Sicily nor Athens but a modern theater?

By supposition, as place is introduced, time may be extended; the time required by the fable elapses, for the most part, between the acts; for, of so much of the action as is represented, the real and poetical duration is the same. If, in the first act, preparations for war against Mithridates are represented to be made in Rome, the event of the war may, without absurdity, be represented, in the catastrophe, as happening in Pontus; we know that there is neither war nor preparation for war; we know that we are neither in Rome nor Pontus, that neither Mithridates nor Lucullus are before us. The drama exhibits successive imitations of successive actions; and why may not the second imitation represent an action that happened years after the first, if it be so connected with it that nothing but time can be supposed to intervene!<sup>1</sup> Time is, of all modes of existence, most obsequious<sup>4</sup> to the imagination; a lapse of years is as easily conceived as a passage of hours. In contemplation we easily contract the time of real actions, and therefore willingly permit it to be contracted when we only see their imitation.

It will be asked how the drama moves if it is not credited. It is credited with all the credit due to a drama. It is credited, whenever it moves, as a just picture of a real original; as representing to the auditor what he would himself feel if he were to do or suffer what is there feigned to be suffered or to be done. The reflection that strikes the heart is not that the evils before us are real evils, but that they are evils to which we ourselves may be exposed. If there be any fallacy, it is not that we fancy the players, but that we fancy ourselves, unhappy for a moment; but we rather lament the possibility than suppose the presence of misery, as a mother weeps over her babe when she remembers that death may take it from her. The delight of tragedy proceeds from our consciousness of fiction; if we thought murders and treasons real, they would please no more.

Imitations produce pain or pleasure, not because they are mistaken for realities, but because they bring realities to mind. When the imagination is recreated<sup>5</sup> by a painted landscape, the trees are not supposed capable to give us shade or the fountains coolness; but we consider how we should be pleased with such fountains playing beside us and such woods waving over us. We are agitated in reading the history of Henry the Fifth; yet no man takes his book for the field of Agincourt. A dramatic exhibition is a book recited with concomitants that increase or diminish its effect. Familiar<sup>6</sup> comedy is often more powerful on the theater than in the page; imperial tragedy is always less. The humor of Petruccio may be heightened by grimace; but what voice or what gesture can hope to add dignity or force to the soliloquy of Cato?<sup>7</sup>

A play read affects the mind like a play acted. It is therefore evident that the action is not supposed to be real; and it follows that between the acts a longer or shorter time may be allowed to pass, and that no more account of space or duration is to be taken by the auditor of a drama than by the reader of a narrative, before whom may pass in an hour the life of a hero or the revolutions of an empire.

Whether Shakespeare knew the unities and rejected them by design or deviated from them by happy ignorance, it is, I think, impossible to decide and useless to inquire. We may reasonably suppose that, when he rose to notice, he did not want<sup>8</sup> the counsels and admonitions of scholars and critics, and that he at last deliberately persisted in a practice which he might have begun by chance. As nothing is essential to the fable but unity of action, and as the unities of time and place arise evidently from false assumptions, and, by circumscribing the extent of the drama, lessen its variety, I cannot think it much to be lamented that they were not known by him, or not observed: nor, if such another poet could arise, should I very vehemently reproach him that his first act passed at Venice and his next in Cyprus.<sup>9</sup> Such violations of rules merely positive<sup>1</sup> become the comprehensive genius of Shakespeare, and such censures are suitable to the minute and slender criticism of Voltaire.

*Non usque aaeo permiscuit imis
Longus summa dies, ut non, si voce Metelli
Serventur leges, malint a Caesare tolli.*<sup>2</sup>

Yet when I speak thus slightly of dramatic rules, I cannot but recollect how much wit and learning may be produced against me; before such authorities I am afraid to stand: not that I think the present question one of those that are to be decided by mere authority, but because it is to be suspected that these precepts have not been so easily received but for better reasons than I have yet been able to find. The result of my inquiries, in which it would be ludicrous to boast of impartiality, is that the unities of time and place are not essential to a just drama, that though they may sometimes conduce to pleasure, they are always to be sacrificed to the nobler beauties of variety and instruction; and that a play written with nice observation of critical rules is to be contemplated as an elaborate curiosity, as the product of superfluous and ostentatious art, by which is shown rather what is possible than what is necessary.

He that without diminution of any other excellence shall preserve all the unities unbroken deserves the like applause with the architect who shall display all the orders of architecture in a citadel without any deduction of its strength; but the principal beauty of a citadel is to exclude the enemy, and the greatest graces of a play are to copy nature and instruct life.* s s

[TWELFTH NIGHT]

This play is in the graver part elegant and easy, and in some of the lighter scenes exquisitely humorous. Ague-cheek is drawn with great propriety, but his character is, in a great measure, that of natural fatuity, and is therefore not the proper prey of a satirist. The soliloquy of Malvolio is truly comick; he is betrayed to ridicule merely by his pride. The marriage of Olivia, and the succeeding perplexity, though well enough contrived to divert on the stage, wants credibility, and fails to produce the proper instruction required in the drama, as it exhibits no just picture of life.

[KING LEAR]

The tragedy of Lear is deservedly celebrated among the dramas of Shakespeare. There is perhaps no play which keeps the attention so strongly fixed; which so much agitates our passions and interests our curiosity. The artful involutions<sup>3</sup> of distinct interests, the striking opposition of contrary characters, the sudden changes of fortune, and the quick succession of events, fill the mind with a perpetual tumult of indignation, pity, and hope. There is no scene which does not contribute to the aggravation of the distress or conduct of the action, and scarce a line which does not conduce to the progress of the scene. So powerful is the current of the poet's imagination, that the mind, which once ventures within it, is hurried irresistibly along.

On the seeming improbability of Lear's conduct it may be observed, that he is represented according to histories at that time vulgarly<sup>4</sup> received as true. And perhaps if we turn our thoughts upon the barbarity and ignorance of the age to which this story is referred, it will appear not so unlikely as while we estimate Lear's manners by our own. Such preference of one daughter to another, or resignation of dominion on such conditions, would be yet credible, if told of a petty prince of Guinea or Madagascar. Shakespeare, indeed, by the mention of his earls and dukes, has given us the idea of times more civilized, and of life regulated by softer manners; and the truth is, that though he so nicely discriminates, and so minutely describes the characters of men, he commonly neglects and confounds the characters of ages, by mingling customs ancient and modern, English and foreign.

My learned friend Mr. Warton, who has in the Adventurer very minutely criticized this play,<sup>5</sup> remarks, that the instances of cruelty are too savage and shocking, and that the intervention of Edmund destroys the simplicity of the story. These objections may, I think, be answered, by repeating that the cruelty of the daughters is an historical fact, to which the poet has added little, having only drawn it into a series by dialogue and action. But I am not able to apologize with equal plausibility for the extrusion of Gloucester's eyes, which seems an act too horrid to be endured in dramatic exhibition, and such as must always compel the mind to relieve its distress by incredulity. Yet let it be remembered that our author well knew what would please the audience for which he wrote.

The injury done by Edmund to the simplicity of the action is abundantly recompensed by the addition of variety, by the art with which he is made to co-operate with the chief design, and the opportunity which he gives the poet of combining perfidy with perfidy, and connecting the wicked son with the wicked daughters, to impress this important moral, that villainy is never at a stop, that crimes lead to crimes, and at last terminate in ruin.

But though this moral be incidentally enforced, Shakespeare has suffered the virtue of Cordelia to perish in a just cause, contrary to the natural ideas of justice, to the hope of the reader, and, what is yet more strange, to the faith of chronicles. Yet this conduct is justified by the Spectator, who blames Tate for giving Cordelia success and happiness in his alteration, and declares that in his opinion, "the tragedy has lost half its beauty."<sup>6</sup> Dennis has remarked, whether justly or not, that to secure the favorable reception of Cato, "the town was poisoned with much false and abominable criticism,"<sup>7</sup> and that endeavors had been used to discredit and decry poetical justice. A play in which the wicked prosper, and the virtuous miscarry, may doubtless be good, because it is a just representation of the common events of human life: but since all reasonable beings naturally love justice, I cannot easily be persuaded, that the observation of justice makes a play worse; or, that if other excellencies are equal, the audience will not always rise better pleased from the final triumph of persecuted virtue.

In the present case the public has decided. Cordelia, from the time of Tate, has always retired with victory and felicity. And, if my sensations could add anything to the general suffrage, I might relate, that I was many years ago so shocked by Cordelia's death, that I know not whether I ever endured to read again the last scenes of the play till I undertook to revise them as an editor.

FROM LIVES OF THE POETS

[METAPHYSICAL WIT]

Wit, like all other things subject by their nature to the choice of man, has its changes and fashions, and at different times takes different forms. About the beginning of the seventeenth century appeared a race of writers that may be termed the metaphysical poets,<sup>2</sup> of whom in a criticism on the works of Cowley it is not improper to give some account.

The metaphysical poets were men of learning, and to show their learning was their whole endeavor; but, unluckily resolving to show it in rhyme, instead of writing poetry they only wrote verses, and very often such verses as stood the trial of the finger better than of the ear; for the modulation was so imperfect that they were only found to be verses by counting the syllables.

If the father of criticism<sup>3</sup> has rightly denominated poetry tekhne mimetike, an imitative art, these writers will without great wrong lose their right to the name of poets, for they cannot be said to have imitated anything: they neither copied nature nor life; neither painted the forms of matter nor represented the operations of intellect.

Those however who deny them to be poets allow them to be wits. Dryden confesses of himself and his contemporaries that they fall below Donne in wit, but maintains that they surpass him in poetry.<sup>4</sup>

If wit be well described by Pope as being "that which has been often thought, but was never before so well expressed,"<sup>5</sup> they certainly never attained nor ever sought it, for they endeavored to be singular in their thoughts, and were careless of their diction. But Pope's account of wit is undoubtedly erroneous; he depresses it below its natural dignity, and reduces it from strength of thought to happiness of language.

1. Abraham Cowley (1618—1667) was much admired during the middle of the 17th century. His reputation began to decline before 1700, but he was remembered as a writer of false wit, especially in his love poems The Mistress.

2. Presumably Johnson took this now common designation from a hint in Dryden's "A Discourse Concerning the Original and Progress of Satire."

Dryden condemned Donne because "he affects the metaphysics . . . and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should engage their hearts, and entertain them with the softnesses of love."

3. Aristotle in his Poetics.

4. "A Discourse . . . of Satire."

5. An Essay on Criticism, lines 297-98.

If by a more noble and more adequate conception that be considered as wit which is at once natural and new, that which though not obvious is, upon its first production, acknowledged to be just; if it be that which he that never found it, wonders how he missed; to wit of this kind the metaphysical poets have seldom risen. Their thoughts are often new, but seldom natural; they are not obvious, but neither are they just;<sup>6</sup> and the reader, far from wondering that he missed them, wonders more frequently by what perverseness of industry they were ever found.

But wit, abstracted from its effects upon the hearer, may be more rigorously and philosophically considered as a kind of discordia concors;<sup>7</sup> a combination of dissimilar images, or discovery of occult resemblances in things apparently unlike. Of wit, thus defined, they have more than enough. The most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together; nature and art are ransacked for illustrations, comparisons, and allusions; their learning instructs, and their subtlety surprises; but the reader commonly thinks his improvement dearly bought, and, though he sometimes admires, is seldom pleased.

From this account of their compositions it will be readily inferred that they were not successful in representing or moving the affections. As they were wholly employed on something unexpected and surprising, they had no regard to that uniformity of sentiment which enables us to conceive and to excite the pains and the pleasure of other minds: they never inquired what on any occasion they should have said or done, but wrote rather as beholders than partakers of human nature; as beings looking upon good and evil, impassive and at leisure; as Epicurean deities making remarks on the actions of men and the vicissitudes of life, without interest and without emotion. Their courtship was void of fondness and their lamentation of sorrow. Their wish was only to say what they hoped had been never said before.

Nor was the sublime more within their reach than the pathetic; for they never attempted that comprehension and expanse of thought which at once fills the whole mind, and of which the first effect is sudden astonishment, and the second rational admiration. Sublimity is produced by aggregation, and littleness by dispersion. Great thoughts are always general, and consist in positions not limited by exceptions, and in descriptions not descending to minuteness. It is with great propriety that subtlety, which in its original import means exility<sup>8</sup> of particles, is taken in its metaphorical meaning for nicety of distinction. Those writers who lay on the watch for novelty could have little hope of greatness; for great things cannot have escaped former observation. Their attempts were always analytic: they broke every image into fragments, and could no more represent by their slender conceits and labored particularities the prospects of nature or the scenes of life, than he who dissects a sunbeam with a prism can exhibit the wide effulgence of a summer noon.

What they wanted however of the sublime they endeavored to supply by hyperbole;<sup>9</sup> their amplification had no limits: they left not only reason but fancy behind them, and produced combinations of confused magnificence that not only could not be credited, but could not be imagined.

Yet great labor directed by great abilities is never wholly lost: if they frequently threw away their wit upon false conceits, they likewise sometimes struck out unexpected truth: if their conceits were farfetched, they were often worth the carriage.<sup>1</sup> To write on their plan it was at least necessary to read and think. No man could be born a metaphysical poet, nor assume the dignity of a writer by descriptions copied from descriptions, by imitations borrowed from imitations, by traditional imagery and hereditary similes, by readiness of rhyme and volubility of syllables.

From Milton<sup>1</sup>

["LYCIDAS"]

One of the poems on which much praise has been bestowed is Lycidas; of which the diction is harsh, the rhymes uncertain, and the numbers<sup>2</sup> unpleasing. What beauty there is, we must therefore seek in the sentiments and images. It is not to be considered as the effusion of real passion; for passion runs not after remote allusions and obscure opinions. Passion plucks no berries from the myrtle and ivy, nor calls upon Arethuse and Mincius, nor tells of "rough satyrs and fauns with cloven heel." Where there is leisure for fiction there is little grief.

In this poem there is no nature, for there is no truth; there is no art, for there is nothing new. Its form is that of a pastoral, easy, vulgar, and therefore disgusting:<sup>3</sup> whatever images it can supply are long ago exhausted; and its inherent improbability always forces dissatisfaction on the mind. When Cowley tells of Hervey that they studied together,<sup>4</sup> it is easy to suppose how much he must miss the companion of his labors and the partner of his discoveries; but what image of tenderness can be excited by these lines!

We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the grayfly winds her sultry horn,
Battening our flocks with the fresh dews of night.

We know that they never drove afield, and that they had no flocks to batten; and though it be allowed that the representation may be allegorical, the true meaning is so uncertain and remote that it is never sought because it cannot be known when it is found.

Among the flocks and copses and flowers appear the heathen deities, Jove and Phoebus, Neptune and Aeolus, with a long train of mythological imagery, such as a college easily supplies. Nothing can less display knowledge or less exercise invention than to tell how a shepherd has lost his companion and must now feed his flocks alone, without any judge of his skill in piping; and how one god asks another god what is become of Lycidas, and how neither

I. In the Life of Addison, Johnson wrote: "A simile may be compared to lines converging at a point, and is more excellent as the lines approach from greater distance."

J. Johnson's treatment of Milton as man and poet offended many ardent Miltonians in his own day and damaged his reputation as a critic in the following century. He did not admire Milton's character, and he detested his politics and religion. But no one has praised Paradise Lost more handsomely.

Especially offensive in the 19th century was his attack on "Lycidas." Johnson disliked modern pastorals, believing that the tradition had been worn threadbare. His views on the genre may be read in Rambler no. 36 and no. 37.

god can tell. He who thus grieves will excite no sympathy; he who thus praises will confer no honor.

This poem has yet a grosser fault. With these trifling fictions are mingled the most awful and sacred truths, such as ought never to be polluted with such irreverent combinations. The shepherd likewise is now a feeder of sheep, and afterwards an ecclesiastical pastor, a superintendent of a Christian flock. Such equivocations are always unskillful; but here they are indecent,<sup>5</sup> and at least approach to impiety, of which, however, I believe the writer not to have been conscious.

Such is the power of reputation justly acquired that its blaze drives away the eye from nice examination. Surely no man could have fancied that he read Lycidas with pleasure had he not known its author.

[PARADISE LOST]

Those little pieces may be dispatched without much anxiety; a greater work calls for greater care. I am now to examine Paradise Lost, a poem which, considered with respect to design, may claim the first place, and with respect to performance the second, among the productions of the human mind.

By the general consent of critics the first praise of genius is due to the writer of an epic poem, as it requires an assemblage of all the powers which are singly sufficient for other compositions. Poetry is the art of uniting pleasure with truth, by calling imagination to the help of reason. Epic poetry undertakes to teach the most important truths by the most pleasing precepts, and therefore relates some great event in the most affecting manner. History must supply the writer with the rudiments of narration, which he must improve and exalt by a nobler art, must animate by dramatic energy, and diversify by retrospection and anticipation; morality must teach him the exact bounds and different shades of vice and virtue; from policy and the practice of life he has to learn the discriminations of character and the tendency of the passions, either single or combined; and physiology<sup>6</sup> must supply him with illustrations and images. To put these materials to poetical use is required an imagination capable of painting nature and realizing fiction. Nor is he yet a poet till he has attained the whole extension of his language, distinguished all the delicacies of phrase, and all the colors of words, and learned to adjust their different sounds to all the varieties of metrical modulation.

Bossu is of opinion that the poet's first work is to find a moral, which his fable is afterwards to illustrate and establish.<sup>7</sup> This seems to have been the process only of Milton: the moral of other poems is incidental and consequent; in Milton's only it is essential and intrinsic. His purpose was the most useful and the most arduous: "to vindicate the ways of God to man";<sup>8</sup> to show the reasonableness of religion, and the necessity of obedience to the Divine Law.

To convey this moral there must be a fable, a narration artfully constructed, so as to excite curiosity and surprise expectation. In this part of his work Milton must be confessed to have equaled every other poet. He has involved in his account of the Fall of Man the events which preceded, and those that were to follow it: he has interwoven the whole system of theology with such propriety that every part appears to be necessary, and scarcely any recital is wished shorter for the sake of quickening the progress of the main action.

The subject of an epic poem is naturally an event of great importance. That of Milton is not the destruction of a city, the conduct of a colony, or the foundation of an empire. His subject is the fate of worlds, the revolutions of heaven and of earth; rebellion against the Supreme King raised by the highest order of created beings; the overthrow of their host and the punishment of their crime; the creation of a new race of reasonable creatures; their original happiness and innocence, their forfeiture of immortality, and their restoration to hope and peace.

Great events can be hastened or retarded only by persons of elevated dignity. Before the greatness displayed in Milton's poem all other greatness shrinks away. The weakest of his agents are the highest and noblest of human beings, the original parents of mankind; with whose actions the elements consented; on whose rectitude or deviation of will depended the state of terrestrial nature and the condition of all the future inhabitants of the globe.

Of the other agents in the poem, the chief are such as it is irreverence to name on slight occasions. The rest were lower powers; of which the least could wield

Those elements, and arm him with the force
Of all their regions;<sup>9</sup> powers which only the control of Omnipotence restrains from laying creation waste, and filling the vast expanse of space with ruin and confusion. To display the motives and actions of beings thus superior, so far as human reason can examine them or human imagination represent them, is the task which this mighty poet has undertaken and performed.

In the examination of epic poems much speculation is commonly employed upon the characters. The characters in the Paradise Lost which admit of examination are those of angels and of man; of angels good and evil, of man in his innocent and sinful state.

Among the angels the virtue of Raphael is mild and placid, of easy condescension and free communication; that of Michael is regal and lofty, and, as may seem, attentive to the dignity of his own nature. Abdiel and Gabriel appear occasionally, and act as every incident requires; the solitary fidelity of Abdiel is very amiably painted.<sup>1</sup>

Of the evil angels the characters are more diversified. To Satan, as Addison observes, such sentiments are given as suit "the most exalted and most depraved being."<sup>2</sup> Milton has been censured by Clarke for the impiety which sometimes breaks from Satan's mouth. For there are thoughts, as he justly remarks, which no observation of character can justify, because no good man would willingly permit them to pass, however transiently, through his own mind.<sup>3</sup> To make Satan speak as a rebel, without any such expressions as might taint the reader's imagination, was indeed one of the great difficulties in Milton's undertaking, and I cannot but think that he has extricated himself with great happiness. There is in Satan's speeches little that can give pain to a pious ear. The language of rebellion cannot be the same with that of obedience. The malignity of Satan foams in haughtiness and obstinacy; but his expressions are commonly general, and no otherwise offensive than as they are wicked.

The other chiefs of the celestial rebellion are very judiciously discriminated in the first and second books; and the ferocious character of Moloch appears, both in the battle and the council, with exact consistency.

To Adam and Eve are given during their innocence such sentiments as innocence can generate and utter. Their love is pure benevolence and mutual veneration; their repasts are without luxury and their diligence without toil. Their addresses to their Maker have little more than the voice of admiration and gratitude. Fruition left them nothing to ask, and Innocence left them nothing to fear.

But with guilt enter distrust and discord, mutual accusation, and stubborn self-defense; they regard each other with alienated minds, and dread their Creator as the avenger of their transgression. At last they seek shelter in his mercy, soften to repentance, and melt in supplication. Both before and after the Fall the superiority of Adam is diligently sustained.

Of the probable and the marvelous,<sup>4</sup> two parts of a vulgar epic poem which immerse the critic in deep consideration, the Paradise Lost requires little to be said. It contains the history of a miracle, of Creation and Redemption; it displays the power and the mercy of the Supreme Being; the probable therefore is marvelous, and the marvelous is probable. The substance of the narrative is truth; and as truth allows no choice, it is, like necessity, superior to rule. To the accidental or adventitious parts, as to every thing human, some slight exceptions may be made. But the main fabric is immovably supported.

It is justly remarked by Addison<sup>5</sup> that this poem has, by the nature of its subject, the advantage above all others, that it is universally and perpetually interesting. All mankind will, through all ages, bear the same relation to Adam and to Eve, and must partake of that good and evil which extend to themselves.

Of the machinery, so called from theos apo mekhanes,<sup>6</sup> by which is meant the occasional interposition of supernatural power, another fertile topic of critical remarks, here is no room to speak, because every thing is done under the immediate and visible direction of Heaven; but the rule is so far observed that no part of the action could have been accomplished by any other means.

Of episodes<sup>7</sup> I think there are only two, contained in Raphael's relation of the war in heaven and Michael's prophetic account of the changes to happen in this world. Both are closely connected with the great action; one was necessary to Adam as a warning, the other as a consolation.

To the completeness or integrity of the design nothing can be objected; it has distinctly and clearly what Aristotle requires, a beginning, a middle, and an end. There is perhaps no poem of the same length from which so little can be taken without apparent mutilation. Here are no funeral games, nor is there any long description of a shield. The short digressions at the beginning of the third, seventh, and ninth books might doubtless be spared; but superfluities so beautiful who would take away? or who does not wish that the author of the Iliad had gratified succeeding ages with a little knowledge of himself?

7. Incidental but related narratives within an epic poem. Johnson is citing Paradise Lost 5.577ff. and 11.334ff.

Perhaps no passages are more frequently or more attentively read than those extrinsic paragraphs; and since the end of poetry is pleasure, that cannot be unpoetical with which all are pleased.

The questions, whether the action of the poem be strictly one,<sup>8</sup> whether the poem can be properly termed heroic, and who is the hero, are raised by such readers as draw their principles of judgment rather from books than from reason. Milton, though he entitled Paradise Lost only a "poem," yet calls it himself "heroic song."<sup>9</sup> Dryden, petulantly and indecently, denies the heroism of Adam because he was overcome; but there is no reason why the hero should not be unfortunate except established practice, since success and virtue do not go necessarily together. Cato is the hero of Lucan, but Lucan's authority will not be suffered by Quintilian to decide. However, if success be necessary, Adam's deceiver was at last crushed; Adam was restored to his Maker's favor, and therefore may securely resume his human rank.

After the scheme and fabric of the poem must be considered its component parts, the sentiments, and the diction.

The sentiments, as expressive of manners or appropriated to characters, are for the greater part unexceptionably just. Splendid passages containing lessons of morality or precepts of prudence occur seldom. Such is the original formation of this poem that as it admits no human manners till the Fall, it can give little assistance to human conduct. Its end is to raise the thoughts above sublunary cares or pleasures. Yet the praise of that fortitude, with which Abdiel maintained his singularity of virtue against the scorn of multitudes, may be accommodated to all times; and Raphael's reproof of Adam's curiosity after the planetary motions, with the answer returned by Adam, may be confidently opposed to any rule of life which any poet has delivered.<sup>1</sup>

The thoughts which are occasionally called forth in the progress are such as could only be produced by an imagination in the highest degree fervid and active, to which materials were supplied by incessant study and unlimited curiosity. The heat of Milton's mind might be said to sublimate his learning, to throw off into his work the spirit of science,<sup>2</sup> unmingled with its grosser parts.

He had considered creation in its whole extent, and his descriptions are therefore learned. He had accustomed his imagination to unrestrained indulgence, and his conceptions therefore were extensive. The characteristic quality of his poem is sublimity. He sometimes descends to the elegant, but his element is the great. He can occasionally invest himself with grace; but his natural port is gigantic loftiness. He can please when pleasure is required; but it is his peculiar power to astonish.

He seems to have been well acquainted with his own genius, and to know what it was that Nature had bestowed upon him more bountifully than upon others; the power of displaying the vast, illuminating the splendid, enforcing the awful, darkening the gloomy, and aggravating the dreadful: he therefore chose a subject on which too much could not be said, on which he might tire his fancy without the censure of extravagance.

2. Knowledge.

The defects and faults of Paradise Lost, for faults and defects every work of man must have, it is the business of impartial criticism to discover. As in displaying the excellence of Milton I have not made long quotations, because of selecting beauties there had been no end, I shall in the same general manner mention that which seems to deserve censure; for what Englishman can take delight in transcribing passages, which, if they lessen the reputation of Milton, diminish in some degree the honor of our country?

The plan of Paradise Lost has this inconvenience, that it comprises neither human actions nor human manners. The man and woman who act and suffer are in a state which no other man or woman can ever know. The reader finds no transaction in which he can be engaged, beholds no condition in which he can by any effort of imagination place himself; he has, therefore, little natural curiosity or sympathy.

We all, indeed, feel the effects of Adam's disobedience; we all sin like Adam, and like him must all bewail our offenses; we have restless and insidious enemies in the fallen angels, and in the blessed spirits we have guardians and friends; in the Redemption of mankind we hope to be included: in the description of heaven and hell we are surely interested, as we are all to reside hereafter either in the regions of horror or of bliss.

But these truths are too important to be new: they have been taught to our infancy; they have mingled with our solitary thoughts and familiar conversation, and are habitually interwoven with the whole texture of life. Being therefore not new they raise no unaccustomed emotion in the mind: what we knew before, we cannot learn; what is not unexpected, cannot surprise.

Of the ideas suggested by these awful scenes, from some we recede with reverence, except when stated hours require their association; and from others we shrink with horror, or admit them only as salutary inflictions, as counterpoises to our interests and passions. Such images rather obstruct the career of fancy than incite it.

Pleasure and terror are indeed the genuine sources of poetry; but poetical pleasure must be such as human imagination can at least conceive, and poetical terror such as human strength and fortitude may combat. The good and evil of Eternity are too ponderous for the wings of wit; the mind sinks under them in passive helplessness, content with calm belief and humble adoration.

Known truths however may take a different appearance, and be conveyed to the mind by a new train of intermediate images. This Milton has undertaken, and performed with pregnancy and vigor of mind peculiar to himself. Whoever considers the few radical<sup>3</sup> positions which the Scriptures afforded him will wonder by what energetic operation he expanded them to such extent and ramified them to so much variety, restrained as he was by religious reverence from licentiousness of fiction.

Here is a full display of the united force of study and genius; of a great accumulation of materials, with judgment to digest and fancy to combine them: Milton was able to select from nature or from story, from ancient fable or from modern science, whatever could illustrate or adorn his thoughts. An accumulation of knowledge impregnated his mind, fermented by study and exalted by imagination.

3. Original or primary.

But original deficiency cannot be supplied. The want of human interest is always felt. Paradise Lost is one of the books which the reader admires and lays down, and forgets to take up again. None ever wished it longer than it is. Its perusal is a duty rather than a pleasure. We read Milton for instruction, retire harassed and overburdened, and look elsewhere for recreation; we desert our master, and seek for companions.

Dryden remarks that Milton has some flats among his elevations.<sup>4</sup> This is only to say that all the parts are not equal. In every work one part must be for the sake of others; a palace must have passages, a poem must have transitions. It is no more to be required that wit should always be blazing than that the sun should always stand at noon. In a great work there is a vicissitude<sup>3</sup> of luminous and opaque parts, as there is in the world a succession of day and night. Milton, when he has expatiated in the sky, may be allowed sometimes to revisit earth; for what other author ever soared so high or sustained his flight so long?

The highest praise of genius is original invention. Milton cannot be said to have contrived the structure of an epic poem, and therefore owes reverence to that vigor and amplitude of mind to which all generations must be indebted for the art of poetical narration, for the texture of the fable, the variation of incidents, the interposition of dialogue, and all the stratagems that surprise and enchain attention. But of all the borrowers from Homer Milton is perhaps the least indebted. He was naturally a thinker for himself, confident of his own abilities and disdainful of help or hindrance; he did not refuse admission to the thoughts or images of his predecessors, but he did not seek them. From his contemporaries he neither courted nor received support; there is in his writings nothing by which the pride of other authors might be gratified or favor gained, no exchange of praise or solicitation of support. His great works were performed under discountenance and in blindness, but difficulties vanished at his touch; he was born for whatever is arduous; and his work is not the greatest of heroic poems, only because it is not the first.

From Pope

[POPE'S INTELLECTUAL CHARACTER. POPE AND DRYDEN COMPARED]

Of his intellectual character, the constituent and fundamental principle was good sense, a prompt and intuitive perception of consonance and propriety. He saw immediately, of his own conceptions, what was to be chosen, and what to be rejected; and, in the works of others, what was to be shunned, and what was to be copied.

But good sense alone is a sedate and quiescent quality, which manages its possessions well, but does not increase them; it collects few materials for its own operations, and preserves safety, but never gains supremacy. Pope had likewise genius; a mind active, ambitious, and adventurous, always investigating, always aspiring; in its widest searches still longing to go forward, in its highest flights still wishing to be higher; always imagining something greater than it knows, always endeavoring more than it can do.

To assist these powers, he is said to have had great strength and exactness of memory. That which he had heard or read was not easily lost; and he had before him not only what his own meditation suggested, but what he had found in other writers that might be accommodated to his present purpose.

These benefits of nature he improved by incessant and unwearied diligence; he had recourse to every source of intelligence, and lost no opportunity of information; he consulted the living as well as the dead; he read his compositions to his friends, and was never content with mediocrity when excellence could be attained. He considered poetry as the business of his life, and however he might seem to lament his occupation, he followed it with constancy: to make verses was his first labor, and to mend them was his last.

From his attention to poetry he was never diverted. If conversation offered anything that could be improved, he committed it to paper; if a thought, or perhaps an expression more happy than was common, rose to his mind, he was careful to write it; an independent distich was preserved for an opportunity of insertion, and some little fragments have been found containing lines, or parts of lines, to be wrought upon at some other time.

He was one of those few whose labor is their pleasure; he was never elevated to negligence, nor wearied to impatience; he never passed a fault unamended by indifference, nor quitted it by despair. He labored his works first to gain reputation, and afterwards to keep it.

Of composition there are different methods. Some employ at once memory and invention, and, with little intermediate use of the pen, form and polish large masses by continued meditation, and write their productions only when, in their own opinion, they have completed them. It is related of Virgil<sup>1</sup> that his custom was to pour out a great number of verses in the morning, and pass the day in retrenching exuberances and correcting inaccuracies. The method of Pope, as may be collected from his translation, was to write his first thoughts in his first words, and gradually to amplify, decorate, rectify, and refine them.

With such faculties and such dispositions, he excelled every other writer in poetical prudence; he wrote in such a manner as might expose him to few hazards. He used almost always the same fabric of verse; and, indeed, by those few essays which he made of any other, he did not enlarge his reputation. Of this uniformity the certain consequence was readiness and dexterity. By perpetual practice, language had in his mind a systematical arrangement; having always the same use for words, he had words so selected and combined as to be ready at his call. This increase of facility he confessed himself to have perceived in the progress of his translation.

But what was yet of more importance, his effusions were always voluntary, and his subjects chosen by himself. His independence secured him from drudging at a task, and laboring upon a barren topic: he never exchanged praise for money, nor opened a shop of condolence or congratulation. His poems, therefore, were scarce ever temporary.<sup>2</sup> He suffered coronations and royal marriages to pass without a song, and derived no opportunities from recent events, nor any popularity from the accidental disposition of his readers. He was never reduced to the necessity of soliciting the sun to shine upon a birthday, of calling the Graces and Virtues to a wedding, or of saying what multitudes have said before him. When he could produce nothing new, he was at liberty to be silent.

His publications were for the same reason never hasty. He is said to have sent nothing to the press till it had lain two years under his inspection: it is at least certain that he ventured nothing without nice examination. He suffered the tumult of imagination to subside, and the novelties of invention to grow familiar. He knew that the mind is always enamored of its own productions, and did not trust his first fondness. He consulted his friends, and listened with great willingness to criticism; and, what was of more importance, he consulted himself, and let nothing pass against his own judgment.

He professed to have learned his poetry from Dryden, whom, whenever an opportunity was presented, he praised through his whole life with unvaried liberality; and perhaps his character may receive some illustration, if he be compared with his master.

Integrity of understanding and nicety of discernment were not allotted in a less proportion to Dryden than to Pope. The rectitude of Dryden's mind was sufficiently shown by the dismissal of his poetical prejudices,<sup>3</sup> and the rejection of unnatural thoughts and rugged numbers. But Dryden never desired to apply all the judgment that he had. He wrote, and professed to write, merely for the people; and when he pleased others, he contented himself. He spent no time in struggles to rouse latent powers; he never attempted to make that better which was already good, nor often to mend what he must have known to be faulty. He wrote, as he tells us, with very little consideration; when occasion or necessity called upon him, he poured out what the present moment happened to supply, and, when once it had passed the press, ejected it from his mind; for when he had no pecuniary interest, he had no further solicitude.

Pope was not content to satisfy; he desired to excel, and therefore always endeavored to do his best: he did not court the candor,<sup>4</sup> but dared the judgment of his reader, and, expecting no indulgence from others, he showed none to himself. He examined lines and words with minute and punctilious observation, and retouched every part with indefatigable diligence, till he had left nothing to be forgiven.

For this reason he kept his pieces very long in his hands, while he considered and reconsidered them. The only poems which can be supposed to have been written with such regard to the times as might hasten their publication were the two satires of Thirty-Eight; of which Dodsley<sup>5</sup> told me that they were brought to him by the author, that they might be fairly copied. "Almost every line," he said, "was then written twice over; I gave him a clean transcript, which he sent some time afterwards to me for the press, with almost every line written twice over a second time."

His declaration, that his care for his works ceased at their publication, was not strictly true. His parental attention never abandoned them; what he found amiss in the first edition, he silently corrected in those that followed. He appears to have revised the Iliad, and freed it from some of its imperfections; and the Essay on Criticism received many improvements after its first appearance. It will seldom be found that he altered without adding clearness, elegance, or vigor. Pope had perhaps the judgment of Dryden; but Dryden certainly wanted the diligence of Pope.

In acquired knowledge, the superiority must be allowed to Dryden, whose education was more scholastic, and who before he became an author had been allowed more time for study, with better means of information. His mind has a larger range, and he collects his images and illustrations from a more extensive circumference of science. Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. The notions of Dryden were formed by comprehensive speculation, and those of Pope by minute attention. There is more dignity in the knowledge of Dryden, and more certainty in that of Pope.

Poetry was not the sole praise of either; for both excelled likewise in prose; but Pope did not borrow his prose from his predecessor. The style of Dryden is capricious and varied, that of Pope is cautious and uniform; Dryden obeys the motions of his own mind, Pope constrains his mind to his own rules of composition; Dryden is sometimes vehement and rapid; Pope is always smooth, uniform, and gentle. Dryden's page is a natural field, rising into inequalities, and diversified by the varied exuberance of abundant vegetation; Pope's is a velvet lawn, shaven by the scythe, and leveled by the roller.

Of genius, that power which constitutes a poet; that quality without which judgment is cold and knowledge is inert; that energy which collects, combines, amplifies, and animates; the superiority must, with some hesitation, be allowed to Dryden. It is not to be inferred that of this poetical vigor Pope had only a little, because Dryden had more; for every other writer since Milton must give place to Pope; and even of Dryden it must be said that if he has brighter paragraphs, he has not better poems. Dryden's performances were always hasty, either excited by some external occasion, or extorted by domestic necessity; he composed without consideration, and published without correction. What his mind could supply at call, or gather in one excursion, was all that he sought, and all that he gave. The dilatory caution of Pope enabled him to condense his sentiments, to multiply his images, and to accumulate all that study might produce, or chance might supply. If the flights of Dryden therefore are higher, Pope continues longer on the wing. If of Dryden's fire the blaze is brighter, of Pope's the heat is more regular and constant. Dryden often surpasses expectation, and Pope never falls below it. Dryden is read with frequent astonishment, and Pope with perpetual delight.

This parallel will, I hope, when it is well considered, be found just; and if the reader should suspect me, as I suspect myself, of some partial fondness for the memory of Dryden, let him not too hastily condemn me; for meditation and inquiry may, perhaps, show him the reasonableness of my determination.

JAMES BOSWELL

The discovery of a vast number of James Boswell's personal papers (believed until 1925 to have been destroyed by his literary executors) has made it possible to know the author of The Life of Samuel Johnson as well as we can know anybody, dead or living. His published letters and journals have made modern readers aware of the serious and absurd, the charming and repellent sides of his character. At twenty-three, when he met Johnson, he had already trained himself to listen, to observe, and to remember until he found time to write it all down. Only rarely did he take notes while a conversation was in progress, since doing this might have inhibited the speakers. His unusual memory and disciplined art enabled him to re-create and vividly preserve the many "scenes" that distinguish his journals as they do the Life.

Boswell was the elder son of Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck (pronounced Affleck) in Ayreshire, a judge who bore the courtesy title of Lord Auchinleck. As a member of an ancient family and heir to its large estate, Boswell was in the technical sense of the term a gentleman, with entree into the best circles of Edinburgh and London. By temperament he was unstable, emotionally and sexually skittish. After attending the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow and studying law in Holland, he made the grand tour of Europe; in Switzerland he met and succeeded in captivating the two foremost French men of letters, Jean-Jacques Rousseau and Voltaire. He visited the beleaguered hero of Corsica, General Pasquale de Paoli, whose revolt against Genoa seemed to European liberals to embody all the civic and military virtues of Republican Rome. Upon returning to England, Boswell wrote An Account of Corsica (1768). It was promptly translated into Dutch, German, French, and Italian, and its young author found himself with a modest European reputation.

By 1769, Boswell was established in what was to prove a successful law practice in Edinburgh and had married his cousin, Margaret Montgomerie. But he kept his ties to London and Johnson. In 1773 he persuaded Johnson to join him in a tour of the Highlands and the Hebrides. Almost every aspect of the adventure should have made it impossible. Johnson, far from young and after years of sedentary city living, found himself astride a horse in wild country or in open boats in autumn weather. As a devout Anglican, he was an outspoken enemy of the Presbyterian church. As a lover of London, he was a stranger to the primitive life of the Highlands. Moreover, for many years he had half-jestingly, half-seriously, made Scots the butt of his wit. But such were Boswell's social tact and Johnson's vigor and curiosity that the tour was a great success. Johnson's Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland (1775) is a thoughtful account of the way that people live in the Hebrides (though some Scots were offended). Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides (1785), a preliminary study for the Life, is a lively and entertaining diary that amused Johnson himself.

In 1788, four years after Johnson's death, Boswell abandoned his Scottish practice; moved to London; was admitted to the English bar (but never actually practiced); and, often depressed and drunken, began the Life. Fortunately he had the help and encouragement of the distinguished literary scholar Edmond Malone, without whose guidance he might never have finished his task.

Boswell had an overwhelming amount of material to deal with: his own journals, all of Johnson's letters that he could find, Johnson's voluminous writings, and every scrap of information that his friends would furnish—all of which had to be collected, verified, and somehow reduced to unity. The Life is a record not of Johnson alone but of literary England during the last half of the century. But Boswell wrote with his eye on the object, and that object was Samuel Johnson, toward whom such eminent persons as Sir Joshua Reynolds, Edmund Burke, Oliver Goldsmith, Lord Chesterfield—even the king himself—always face. Individual episodes are designed to reveal the great protagonist in a variety of aspects, and the world that Boswell created and populated is sustained by the vitality of his hero.

Boswell's gift is not only narrative but also dramatic. A gifted mimic, he often writes like a theatrical improviser, creating scenes with living people and playing simultaneously the roles of contriver of the dialogue, director of the plot, actor in the drama, and applauding audience—for Boswell kept an eye on his own performance. The quintessence of Boswell as both a social genius and a literary artist is to be found in his description of his visit to Voltaire: "I placed myself by him. I touched the keys in unison with his imagination. I wish you had heard the music."

Although the Johnson of popular legend is largely Boswell's creation, there was much in his life about which Boswell had no firsthand knowledge. At their first meeting, Johnson was fifty-four, a widower, already established as "Dictionary" Johnson and the author of the Rambler, and pensioned by the crown. Boswell knew nothing at firsthand of the long, hard years during which Johnson made his way painfully up from obscurity to fame. Hence the Life is the portrait of a sage. Its chief glory is conversation: the talk of a man who has experienced broadly, read widely, and observed and reflected on his observations; whose ideas are constantly brought to the test of experience; and whose experience is habitually transmuted into ideas. The book is as large as life and as human as its central character.

From Boswell on the Grand Tour

And whence do I now write to you, my friend?<sup>2</sup> From the chateau of Monsieur de Voltaire. I had a letter for him from a Swiss colonel at The Hague. I came hither Monday and was presented to him. He received me with dignity and that air of a man who has been much in the world which a Frenchman acquires in perfection. I saw him for about half an hour before dinner. He was not in spirits. Yet he gave me some brilliant sallies. He did not dine with us, and I was obliged to post away immediately after dinner, because the gates of Geneva shut before five and Ferney is a good hour from town. I was by no means satisfied to have been so little time with the monarch of French literature. A happy scheme sprung up in my adventurous mind. Madame Denis, the niece of Monsieur de Voltaire, had been extremely good to me. She is fond of our language. I wrote her a letter in English begging her interest to obtain for me the privilege of lodging a night under the roof of Monsieur de Voltaire, who, in opposition to our sun, rises in the evening. I was in the finest humor and my letter was full of wit. I told her, "I am a hardy and a vigorous Scot. You may mount me to the highest and coldest garret. I shall not even refuse to sleep upon two chairs in the bedchamber of your maid. I saw her pass through the room where we sat before dinner." I sent my letter on Tuesday by an express. It was shown to Monsieur de Voltaire, who with his own hand wrote this answer in the character of Madame Denis: "You will do us much honor and pleasure. We have few beds. But you will (shall) not sleep on two

1. Voltaire was the name assumed by Francois-Marie Arouet (1694-1778), the most famous French writer of his generation. Playwright, poet, satirist, philosopher, enemy of the church, and irrepressible ironist, he (after a stormy career) was living in splendor at his chateau at Ferney near the border of Switzerland and France, just outside

Geneva. His housekeeper and mistress was his niece Marie-Louise Denis. He and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, whom Boswell had just visited and flattered, were deadly enemies.

2. This passage is taken from a letter, dated December 28, 1764, written to Boswell's closest friend, a young clergyman named William Temple.

chairs. My uncle, though very sick, hath guessed at your merit. I know it better; for I have seen you longer." * * *

I returned yesterday to this enchanted castle. The magician appeared a very little before dinner. But in the evening he came into the drawing room in great spirits. I placed myself by him. I touched the keys in unison with his imagination. I wish you had heard the music. He was all brilliance. He gave me continued flashes of wit. I got him to speak English, which he does in a degree that made me now and then start up and cry, "Upon my soul this is astonishing!" When he talked our language he was animated with the soul of a Briton. He had bold flights. He had humor. He had an extravagance; he had a forcible oddity of style that the most comical of our dramatis personae could not have exceeded. He swore bloodily, as was the fashion when he was in England.<sup>3</sup> He hummed a ballad; he repeated nonsense. Then he talked of our Constitution with a noble enthusiasm. I was proud to hear this from the mouth of an illustrious Frenchman. At last we came upon religion. Then did he rage. The company went to supper. Monsieur de Voltaire and I remained in the drawing room with a great Bible before us; and if ever two mortal men disputed with vehemence, we did. Yes, upon that occasion he was one individual and I another. For a certain portion of time there was a fair opposition between Voltaire and Boswell. The daring bursts of his ridicule confounded my understanding. He stood like an orator of ancient Rome. Tully<sup>4</sup> was never more agitated than he was. He went too far. His aged frame trembled beneath him. He cried, "Oh, I am very sick; my head turns round," and he let himself gently fall upon an easy chair. He recovered. I resumed our conversation, but changed the tone. I talked to him serious and earnest. I demanded of him an honest confession of his real sentiments. He gave it me with candor and with a mild eloquence which touched my heart. I did not believe him capable of thinking in the manner that he declared to me was "from the bottom of his heart." He expressed his veneration—his love—of the Supreme Being, and his entire resignation to the will of Him who is all-wise. He expressed his desire to resemble the Author of Goodness by being good himself. His sentiments go no farther. He does not inflame his mind with grand hopes of the immortality of the soul. He says it may be, but he knows nothing of it. And his mind is in perfect tranquility. I was moved; I was sorry. I doubted his sincerity. I called to him with emotion, "Are you sincere? are you really sincere?" He answered "Before God, I am." Then with the fire of him whose tragedies have so often shone on the theater of Paris, he said, "I suffer much. But I suffer with patience and resignation; not as a Christian—but as a man."

Temple, was not this an interesting scene? Would a journey from Scotland to Ferney have been too much to obtain such a remarkable interview? * * *

3. In 1726, to avoid imprisonment because of a quarrel with a nobleman, Voltaire had gone into exile in England, where he remained for three years, meeting many distinguished English writers and statesmen and learning to admire the British Constitution and the English principle of religious toleration. His Lettres philosophiques sur les Anglais (1734) expressed his admiration of English institutions and indirectly criticized France.

From The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D.[PLAN OF THE LIFE]

* * * Had Dr. Johnson written his own life, in conformity with the opinion which he has given, that every man's life may be best written by himself; had he employed in the preservation of his own history, that clearness of narration and elegance of language in which he has embalmed so many eminent persons, the world would probably have had the most perfect example of biography that was ever exhibited. But although he at different times, in a desultory manner, committed to writing many particulars of the progress of his mind and fortunes, he never had persevering diligence enough to form them into a regular composition. Of these memorials a few have been preserved; but the greater part was consigned by him to the flames, a few days before his death.

As I had the honor and happiness of enjoying his friendship for upwards of twenty years; as I had the scheme of writing his life constantly in view; as he was well apprised of this circumstance, and from time to time obligingly satisfied my inquiries, by communicating to me the incidents of his early years; as I acquired a facility in recollecting, and was very assiduous in recording, his conversation, of which the extraordinary vigor and vivacity constituted one of the first features of his character; and as I have spared no pains in obtaining materials concerning him, from every quarter where I could discover that they were to be found, and have been favored with the most liberal communications by his friends; I flatter myself that few biographers have entered upon such a work as this with more advantages; independent of literary abilities, in which I am not vain enough to compare myself with some great names who have gone before me in this kind of writing. * * *

Instead of melting down my materials into one mass, and constantly speaking in my own person, by which I might have appeared to have more merit in the execution of the work, I have resolved to adopt and enlarge upon the excellent plan of Mr. Mason, in his Memoirs of Gray.<sup>2</sup> Wherever narrative is necessary to explain, connect, and supply, I furnish it to the best of my abilities; but in the chronological series of Johnson's life, which I trace as distinctly as I can, year by year, I produce, wherever it is in my power, his own minutes, letters, or conversation, being convinced that this mode is more lively, and will make my readers better acquainted with him than even most of those were who actually knew him, but could know him only partially; whereas there is here an accumulation of intelligence from various points, by which his character is more fully understood and illustrated.

Indeed I cannot conceive a more perfect mode of writing any man's life than not only relating all the most important events of it in their order, but interweaving what he privately wrote, and said, and thought; by which mankind are enabled as it were to see him live, and to "live o'er each scene"<sup>3</sup> with him, as he actually advanced through the several stages of his life. Had his other friends been as diligent and ardent as I was, he might have been almost entirely preserved. As it is, I will venture to say that he will be seen in this work more completely than any man who has ever yet lived.

And he will be seen as he really was; for I profess to write, not his panegyric, which must be all praise, but his Life; which, great and good as he was, must not be supposed to be entirely perfect. To be as he was, is indeed subject of panegyric enough to any man in this state of being; but in every picture there should be shade as well as light, and when I delineate him without reserve, I do what he himself recommended, both by his precept and his example. * * *

I am fully aware of the objections which may be made to the minuteness on some occasions of my detail of Johnson's conversation, and how happily it is adapted for the petty exercise of ridicule, by men of superficial understanding and ludicrous fancy; but I remain firm and confident in my opinion, that minute particulars are frequently characteristic, and always amusing, when they relate to a distinguished man. I am therefore exceedingly unwilling that anything, however slight, which my illustrious friend thought it worth his while to express, with any degree of point, should perish. * * *

Of one thing I am certain, that considering how highly the small portion which we have of the table-talk and other anecdotes of our celebrated writers is valued, and how earnestly it is regretted that we have not more, I am justified in preserving rather too many of Johnson's sayings, than too few; especially as from the diversity of dispositions it cannot be known with certainty beforehand, whether what may seem trifling to some, and perhaps to the collector himself, may not be most agreeable to many; and the greater number that an author can please in any degree, the more pleasure does there arise to a benevolent mind. * * *

[JOHNSON'S EARLY YEARS. MARRIAGE AND LONDON']

[J 709] Samuel Johnson was born at Lichfield, in Staffordshire, on the 18th of September, N.S.,<sup>4</sup> 1709; and his initiation into the Christian Church was not delayed; for his baptism is recorded, in the register of St. Mary's parish in that city, to have been performed on the day of his birth. His father is there styled Gentleman, a circumstance of which an ignorant panegyrist has praised him for not being proud; when the truth is, that the appellation of Gentleman, though now lost in the indiscriminate assumption of Esquire, was commonly taken by those who could not boast of gentility. His father was Michael Johnson, a native of Derbyshire, of obscure extraction, who settled in Lichfield as a bookseller and stationer. His mother was Sarah Ford, descended of an ancient race of substantial yeomanry in Warwickshire. They were well advanced in years when they married, and never had more than two children, both sons; Samuel, their first-born, who lived to be the illustrious character whose various excellence I am to endeavor to record, and Nathanael, who died in his twenty-fifth year.

Mr. Michael Johnson was a man of a large and robust body, and of a strong and active mind; yet, as in the most solid rocks veins of unsound substance are often discovered, there was in him a mixture of that disease, the nature of which eludes the most minute inquiry, though the effects are well known to be a weariness of life, an unconcern about those things which agitate the greater part of mankind, and a general sensation of gloomy wretchedness. From him then his son inherited, with some other qualities, "a vile melancholy," which in his too strong expression of any disturbance of the mind, "made him mad all his life, at least not sober." Michael was, however, forced by the narrowness of his circumstances to be very diligent in business, not only in his shop, but by occasionally resorting to several towns in the neighborhood, some of which were at a considerable distance from Lichfield. At that time booksellers' shops in the provincial towns of England were very rare, so that there was not one even in Birmingham, in which town old Mr. Johnson used to open a shop every market day. He was a pretty good Latin scholar, and a citizen so creditable as to be made one of the magistrates of Lichfield; and, being a man of good sense, and skill in his trade, he acquired a reasonable share of wealth, of which however he afterwards lost the greatest part, by engaging unsuccessfully in a manufacture of parchment. He was a zealous highchurch man and royalist, and retained his attachment to the unfortunate house of Stuart, though he reconciled himself, by casuistical arguments of expediency and necessity, to take the oaths imposed by the prevailing power. * * *

Johnson's mother was a woman of distinguished understanding. I asked his old schoolfellow, Mr. Hector,<sup>5</sup> surgeon of Birmingham, if she was not vain of her son. He said, "She had too much good sense to be vain, but she knew her son's value." Her piety was not inferior to her understanding; and to her must be ascribed those early impressions of religion upon the mind of her son, from which the world afterwards derived so much benefit. He told me that he remembered distinctly having had the first notice of Heaven, "a place to which good people went," and hell, "a place to which bad people went," communicated to him by her, when a little child in bed with her; and that it might be the better fixed in his memory, she sent him to repeat it to Thomas Jackson, their manservant; he not being in the way, this was not done; but there was no occasion for any artificial aid for its preservation. * * *

[7728] That a man in Mr. Michael Johnson's circumstances should think of sending his son to the expensive University of Oxford, at his own charge, seems very improbable. The subject was too delicate to question Johnson upon. But I have been assured by Dr. Taylor<sup>6</sup> that the scheme never would have taken place had not a gentleman of Shropshire, one of his schoolfellows, spontaneously undertaken to support him at Oxford, in the character of his companion; though, in fact, he never received any assistance whatever from that gentleman.

He, however, went to Oxford, and was entered a Commoner of Pembroke College on the 31st of October, 1728, being then in his nineteenth year.

The Reverend Dr. Adams,<sup>7</sup> who afterwards presided over Pembroke College with universal esteem, told me he was present, and gave me some account of what passed on the night of Johnson's arrival at Oxford. On that evening, his father, who had anxiously accompanied him, found means to have him introduced to Mr. Jorden, who was to be his tutor. * * *

His father seemed very full of the merits of his son, and told the company he was a good scholar, and a poet, and wrote Latin verses. His figure and manner appeared strange to them; but he behaved modestly and sat silent, till upon something which occurred in the course of conversation, he suddenly struck in and quoted Macrobius; and thus he gave the first impression of that more extensive reading in which he had indulged himself.

His tutor, Mr. Jorden, fellow of Pembroke, was not, it seems, a man of such abilities as we should conceive requisite for the instructor of Samuel Johnson, who gave me the following account of him. "He was a very worthy man, but a heavy man, and I did not profit much by his instructions. Indeed, I did not attend him much. The first day after I came to college I waited upon him, and then stayed away four. On the sixth, Mr. Jorden asked me why I had not attended. I answered I had been sliding in Christ Church meadow. And this I said with as much nonchalance as I am now talking to you. I had no notion that I was wrong or irreverent to my tutor." BOSWELL: "That, Sir, was great fortitude of mind." JOHNSON: "NO, Sir; stark insensibility." * * *

[1729] The "morbid melancholy," which was lurking in his constitution, and to which we may ascribe those particularities and that aversion to regular life, which, at a very early period, marked his character, gathered such strength in his twentieth year as to afflict him in a dreadful manner. While he was at Lichfield, in the college vacation of the year 1729, he felt himself overwhelmed with an horrible hypochondria,<sup>8</sup> with perpetual irritation, fretfulness, and impatience; and with a dejection, gloom, and despair, which made existence misery. From this dismal malady he never afterwards was perfectly relieved; and all his labors, and all his enjoyments, were but temporary interruptions of its baleful influence. He told Mr. Paradise<sup>9</sup> that he was sometimes so languid and inefficient that he could not distinguish the hour upon the town-clock. * * *

To Johnson, whose supreme enjoyment was the exercise of his reason, the disturbance or obscuration of that faculty was the evil most to be dreaded. Insanity, therefore, was the object of his most dismal apprehension; and he fancied himself seized by it, or approaching to it, at the very time when he was giving proofs of a more than ordinary soundness and vigor of judgment. That his own diseased imagination should have so far deceived him, is strange; but it is stranger still that some of his friends should have given credit to his groundless opinion, when they had such undoubted proofs that it was totally fallacious; though it is by no means surprising that those who wish to depreciate him should, since his death, have laid hold of this circumstance, and insisted upon it with very unfair aggravation. * * *

Dr. Adams told me that Johnson, while he was at Pembroke College, "was caressed and loved by all about him, was a gay and frolicsome fellow, and passed there the happiest part of his life." But this is a striking proof of the fallacy of appearances, and how little any of us know of the real internal state even of those whom we see most frequently; for the truth is, that he was then depressed by poverty, and irritated by disease. When I mentioned to him this account as given me by Dr. Adams, he said, "Ah, Sir, I was mad and violent. It was bitterness which they mistook for frolic. I was miserably poor, and I thought to fight my way by my literature and my wit; so I disregarded all power and all authority." <sup>4</sup> * * *

[1734] In a man whom religious education has secured from licentious indulgences, the passion of love, when once it has seized him, is exceedingly strong; being unimpaired by dissipation,<sup>1</sup> and totally concentrated in one object. This was experienced by Johnson, when he became the fervent admirer of Mrs. Porter, after her first husband's death. Miss Porter told me that when he was first introduced to her mother, his appearance was very forbidding: he was then lean and lank, so that his immense structure of bones was hideously striking to the eye, and the scars of the scrofula were deeply visible. He also wore his hair,<sup>2</sup> which was straight and stiff, and separated behind: and he often had, seemingly, convulsive starts and odd gesticulations, which tended to excite at once surprise and ridicule. Mrs. Porter was so much engaged by his conversation that she overlooked all these external disadvantages, and said to her daughter, "This is the most sensible man that I ever saw in my life."

[J 735] Though Mrs. Porter was double the age of Johnson, and her person and manner, as described to me by the late Mr. Garrick,<sup>3</sup> were by no means pleasing to others, she must have had a superiority of understanding and talents, as she certainly inspired him with a more than ordinary passion; and she having signified her willingness to accept of his hand, he went to Lichfield to ask his mother's consent to the marriage, which he could not but be conscious was a very imprudent scheme, both on account of their disparity of years and her want of fortune. But Mrs. Johnson knew too well the ardor of her son's temper, and was too tender a parent to oppose his inclinations.

I know not for what reason the marriage ceremony was not performed at Birmingham; but a resolution was taken that it should be at Derby, for which place the bride and bridegroom set out on horseback, I suppose in very good humor. But though Mr. Topham Beauclerk<sup>4</sup> used archly to mention Johnson's having told him, with much gravity, "Sir, it was a love marriage on both sides," I have had from my illustrious friend the following curious account of their journey to church upon the nuptial morn:

9th July: "Sir, she had read the old romances, and had got into her head the fantastical notion that a woman of spirit should use her lover like a dog. So, Sir, at first she told me that I rode too fast, and she could not keep up with me; and, when I rode a little slower, she passed me, and complained that I lagged behind. I was not to be made the slave of caprice; and I resolved to begin as I meant to end. I therefore pushed on briskly, till I was fairly out of her sight. The road lay between two hedges, so I was sure she could not miss it; and I contrived that she should soon come up with me. When she did, I observed her to be in tears." * * *

[i 737] Johnson now thought of trying his fortune in London, the great field of genius and exertion, where talents of every kind have the fullest scope and the highest encouragement. It is a memorable circumstance that his pupil David Garrick went thither at the same time, with intention to complete his education, and follow the profession of the law, from which he was soon diverted by his decided preference for the stage.<sup>5</sup> * * *

[1744] * * * He produced one work this year, fully sufficient to maintain the high reputation which he had acquired. This was The Life of Richard Savage;<sup>6</sup> a man of whom it is difficult to speak impartially without wondering

4. Pronounced bo-clare. A descendant of Charles II and the actress Nell Gwynn, he was brilliant and dissolute.

5. Johnson had hoped to complete his tragedy Irene and to get it produced, but this was not accomplished until Garrick staged it in 1749. Meanwhile Johnson struggled against poverty, at first as a writer and translator for Edward Cave's Gentleman's Magazine. He gradually won recognition but was never financially secure until he was pensioned in 1762. Garrick succeeded in the theater much more rapidly than did Johnson in literature.

6. The poet Richard Savage courted and gained notoriety by claiming to be the illegitimate son of Earl Rivers and the Countess of Macclesfield, whose husband had divorced her because of her unfaithfulness with Rivers. Savage publicized his that he was for some time the intimate companion of Johnson; for his character was marked by profligacy, insolence, and ingratitude: yet, as he undoubtedly had a warm and vigorous, though unregulated mind, had seen life in all its varieties, and been much in the company of the statesmen and wits of his time, he could communicate to Johnson an abundant supply of such materials as his philosophical curiosity most eagerly desired; and as Savage's misfortunes and misconduct had reduced him to the lowest state of wretchedness as a writer for bread, his visits to St. John's Gate<sup>7</sup> naturally brought Johnson and him together.

It is melancholy to reflect that Johnson and Savage were sometimes in such extreme indigence that they could not pay for a lodging; so that they have wandered together whole nights in the streets. Yet in these almost incredible scenes of distress, we may suppose that Savage mentioned many of the anecdotes with which Johnson afterwards enriched the life of his unhappy companion, and those of other poets.

He told Sir Joshua Reynolds that one night in particular, when Savage and he walked round St. James's Square for want of a lodging, they were not at all depressed by their situation; but in high spirits and brimful of patriotism, traversed the square for several hours, inveighed against the minister, and "resolved they would stand by their country." * * *

[1752] That there should be a suspension of his literary labors during a part of the year 1752<sup>R</sup> will not seem strange when it is considered that soon after closing his Rambler, he suffered a loss which, there can be no doubt, affected him with the deepest distress. For on the 17th of March, O.S., his wife died.

The following very solemn and affecting prayer was found, after Dr. Johnson's decease, by his servant, Mr. Francis Barber, who delivered it to my worthy friend the Reverend Mr. Strahan, Vicar of Islington, who at my earnest request has obligingly favored me with a copy of it, which he and I compared with the original:

"April 26, 1752, being after 12 at night of the 25th.

"O Lord! Governor of heaven and earth, in whose hands are embodied and departed spirits, if thou hast ordained the souls of the dead to minister to the living, and appointed my departed wife to have care of me, grant that I may enjoy the good effects of her attention and ministration, whether exercised by appearance, impulses, dreams or in any other manner agreeable to thy government. Forgive my presumption, enlighten my ignorance, and however meaner agents are employed, grant me the blessed influences of thy holy Spirit, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

One night when Beauclerk and Langton<sup>9</sup> had supped at a tavern in London, and sat till about three in the morning, it came into their heads to go and claim and persecuted his alleged mother. Johnson and many others believed Savage's story and resented what they considered the lady's inhumanity. Savage was a gifted man, but he lived in poverty as a hack writer, although he was long assisted by Pope and others. He died in a debtor's prison in Bristol in 1743.

knock up Johnson, and see if they could prevail on him to join them in a ramble. They rapped violently at the door of his chambers in the Temple,<sup>1</sup> till at last he appeared in his shirt, with his little black wig on the top of his head, instead of a nightcap, and a poker in his hand, imagining, probably, that some ruffians were coming to attack him. When he discovered who they were, and was told their errand, he smiled, and with great good humor agreed to their proposal: "What, is it you, you dogs! I'll have a frisk with you." He was soon dressed, and they sallied forth together into Covent Garden, where the green-grocers and fruiterers were beginning to arrange their hampers, just come in from the country. Johnson made some attempts to help them; but the honest gardeners stared so at his figure and manner and odd interference, that he soon saw his services were not relished. They then repaired to one of the neighboring taverns, and made a bowl of that liquor called Bishop,<sup>2</sup> which Johnson had always liked; while in joyous contempt of sleep, from which he had been roused, he repeated the festive lines,

Short, O short then be thy reign,
And give us to the world again!<sup>3</sup>

They did not stay long, but walked down to the Thames, took a boat, and rowed to Billingsgate. Beauclerk and Johnson were so well pleased with their amusement that they resolved to persevere in dissipation for the rest of the day: but Langton deserted them, being engaged to breakfast with some young ladies. Johnson scolded him for "leaving his social friends, to go and sit with a set of wretched un-idea'd girls." Garrick being told of this ramble, said to him smartly, "I heard of your frolic t' other night. You'll be in the Chronicle." Upon which Johnson afterwards observed, "He durst not do such a thing. His wife would not let him!" * * *

[THE LETTER TO CHESTERFIELD]

[1754] Lord Chesterfield,<sup>4</sup> to whom Johnson had paid the high compliment of addressing to his Lordship the Plan of his Dictionary, had behaved to him in such a manner as to excite his contempt and indignation. The world has been for many years amused with a story confidently told, and as confidently repeated with additional circumstances, that a sudden disgust was taken by Johnson upon occasion of his having been one day kept long in waiting in his Lordship's antechamber, for which the reason assigned was that he had company with him; and that at last, when the door opened, out walked Colley Cibber;<sup>5</sup> and that Johnson was so violently provoked when he found for whom he had been so long excluded, that he went away in a passion, and never would return. I remember having mentioned this story to George Lord Lyttelton, who told me he was very intimate with Lord Chesterfield; and holding it as a well-known truth, defended Lord Chesterfield, by saying, that Cibber, who had been introduced familiarly by the back stairs, had probably not been there above ten minutes. It may seem strange even to entertain a doubt concerning a story so long and so widely current, and thus implicitly adopted, if not sanctioned, by the authority which I have mentioned; but Johnson himself assured me that there was not the least foundation for it. He told me that there never was any particular incident which produced a quarrel between Lord Chesterfield and him; but that his Lordship's continued neglect was the reason why he resolved to have no connection with him. When the Dictionary' was upon the eve of publication, Lord Chesterfield, who, it is said, had flattered himself with expectations that Johnson would dedicate the work to him, attempted, in a courtly manner, to soothe, and insinuate himself with the sage, conscious, as it should seem, of the cold indifference with which he had treated its learned author; and further attempted to conciliate him, by writing two papers in The World, in recommendation of the work; and it must be confessed that they contain some studied compliments, so finely turned, that if there had been no previous offense, it is probable that Johnson would have been highly delighted. Praise, in general, was pleasing to him; but by praise from a man of rank and elegant accomplishments, he was peculiarly gratified. * 4 *

This courtly device failed of its effect. Johnson, who thought that "all was false and hollow,"<sup>6</sup> despised the honeyed words, and was even indignant that Lord Chesterfield should, for a moment, imagine that he could be dupe of such an artifice. His expression to me concerning Lord Chesterfield, upon this occasion, was, "Sir, after making great professions, he had, for many years, taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell ascribing in The World about it. Upon which, I wrote him a letter expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him."

This is that celebrated letter of which so much has been said, and about which curiosity has been so long excited, without being gratified. I for many years solicited Johnson to favor me with a copy of it, that so excellent a composition might not be lost to posterity. He delayed from time to time to give it me; till at last in 1781, when we were on a visit at Mr. Dilly's,<sup>7</sup> at Southill in Bedfordshire, he was pleased to dictate it to me from memory. He afterwards found among his papers a copy of it, which he had dictated to Mr. Baretti,<sup>8</sup> with its title and corrections, in his own handwriting. This he gave to Mr. Langton; adding that if it were to come into print, he wished it to be from that copy. By Mr. Langton's kindness, I am enabled to enrich my work with a perfect transcript of what the world has so eagerly desired to see.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD

February 7, 1755

MY LORD,

I have been lately informed, by the proprietor of The World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your Lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honor, which, being very little accustomed to favors from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address; and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre<sup>9</sup>—that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found my attendance so little encouraged that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could; and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

Seven years, my Lord, have now passed since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favor. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before.

The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.'

Is not a patron, my Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labors, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing that to a patron which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favorer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less; for I have been long wakened from that dream of hope in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation, my Lord, your Lordship's most humble, most obedient servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"While this was the talk of the town," says Dr. Adams, in a letter to me, "I happened to visit Dr. Warburton,<sup>2</sup> who finding that I was acquainted with Johnson, desired me earnestly to carry his compliments to him, and to tell him that he honored him for his manly behavior in rejecting these condescensions of Lord Chesterfield, and for resenting the treatment he had received from him, with a proper spirit. Johnson was visibly pleased with this compliment, for he had always a high opinion of Warburton. Indeed, the force of mind which appeared in this letter was congenial with that which Warburton himself amply possessed."

There is a curious minute circumstance which struck me, in comparing the various editions of Johnson's imitations of Juvenal. In the tenth satire, one of the couplets upon the vanity of wishes even for literary distinction stood thus:

Yet think what ills the scholar's life assail,
Toil, envy, want, the garret, and the jail.

But after experiencing the uneasiness which Lord Chesterfield's fallacious patronage made him feel, he dismissed the word garret from the sad group, and in all the subsequent editions the line stands

Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.

[1762] The accession of George the Third to the throne of these kingdoms<sup>3</sup> opened a new and brighter prospect to men of literary merit, who had been honored with no mark of royal favor in the preceding reign. His present Majesty's education in this country, as well as his taste and beneficence, prompted him to be the patron of science and the arts; and early this year Johnson, having been represented to him as a very learned and good man, without any certain provision, his Majesty was pleased to grant him a pension of three hundred pounds a year. The Earl of Bute,<sup>4</sup> who was then Prime Minister, had the honor to announce this instance of his Sovereign's bounty, concerning which many and various stories, all equally erroneous, have been propagated: maliciously representing it as a political bribe to Johnson, to desert his avowed principles, and become the tool of a government which he held to be founded in usurpation. I have taken care to have it in my power to refute them from the most authentic information. Lord Bute told me that Mr. Wedderburne, now Lord Loughborough, was the person who first mentioned this subject to him. Lord Loughborough told me that the pension was granted to Johnson solely as the reward of his literary merit, without any stipulation whatever, or even tacit understanding that he should write for administration. His Lordship added that he was confident the political tracts which Johnson afterwards did write, as they were entirely consonant with his own opinions, would have been written by him though no pension had been granted to him." 4 * *

[A MEMORABLE YEAR: BOSWELL MEETS JOHNSON]

[1763] This is to me a memorable year; for in it I had the happiness to obtain the acquaintance of that extraordinary man whose memoirs I am now writing; an acquaintance which I shall ever esteem as one of the most fortunate circumstances in my life. * * *

Mr. Thomas Davies the actor, who then kept a bookseller's shop in Russel Street, Covent Garden, told me that Johnson was very much his friend, and came frequently to his house, where he more than once invited me to meet him; but by some unlucky accident or other he was prevented from coming to us. 9 * *

At last, on Monday the 16th of May, when I was sitting in Mr. Davies's back parlor, after having drunk tea with him and Mrs. Davies, Johnson unexpectedly came into the shop; and Mr. Davies having perceived him through the glass door in the room in which we were sitting, advancing towards us—he announced his awful approach to me, somewhat in the manner of an actor in the part of Horatio, when he addresses Hamlet on the appearance of his father's ghost, "Look, my Lord, it comes." I found that I had a very perfect idea of Johnson's figure, from the portrait of him painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds soon after he had published his Dictionary, in the attitude of sitting in his easy chair in deep meditation, which was the first picture his friend did for him, which Sir Joshua very kindly presented to me, and from which an engraving has been made for this work. Mr. Davies mentioned my name, and respectfully introduced me to him. I was much agitated; and recollecting his prejudice against the Scotch, of which I had heard much, I said to Davies, "Don't tell where I come from."—"From Scotland," cried Davies roguishly. "Mr. Johnson," said I, "I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it." I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to soothe and conciliate him, and not as an humiliating abasement at the expense of my country. But however that might be, this speech was somewhat unlucky; for with that quickness of wit for which he was so remarkable, he seized the expression "come from Scotland," which I used in the sense of being of that country; and, as if I had said that I had come away from it, or left it, retorted, "That, Sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help." This stroke stunned me a good deal; and when we had sat down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next. He then addressed himself to Davies: "What do you think of Garrick? He has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams,<sup>6</sup> because he knows the house will be full, and that an order would be worth three shillings." Eager to take any opening to get into conversation with him, I ventured to say, "O Sir, I cannot think Mr. Garrick would grudge such a trifle to you." "Sir," said he, with a stern look, "I have known David Garrick longer than you have done: and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject." Perhaps I deserved this check; for it was rather presumptuous in me, an entire stranger, to express any doubt of the justice of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. I now felt myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope which I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted. And, in truth, had not my ardor been uncommonly strong, and my resolution uncommonly persevering, so rough a reception might have deterred me forever from making any further attempts. Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field not wholly discomfited. * * *

5. Johnson's few political pamphlets in the 1770s invariably supported the policies of the crown. The best known is his answer to the American colonies, "Taxation No Tyranny" (1775). His dislike of the Americans was in large part due to the fact they owned slaves.

I was highly pleased with the extraordinary vigor of his conversation, and regretted that I was drawn away from it by an engagement at another place. I had, for a part of the evening, been left alone with him, and had ventured to make an observation now and then, which he received very civilly; so that I was satisfied that though there was a roughness in his manner, there was no ill nature in his disposition. Davies followed me to the door, and when I complained to him a little of the hard blows which the great man had given me, he kindly took upon him to console me by saying, "Don't be uneasy. I can see he likes you very well."

A few days afterwards I called on Davies, and asked him if he thought I might take the liberty of waiting on Mr. Johnson at his chambers in the Tempie. He said I certainly might, and that Mr. Johnson would take it as a compliment. So upon Tuesday the 24th of May, after having been enlivened by the witty sallies of Messieurs Thornton, Wilkes, Churchill, and Lloyd,<sup>7</sup> with whom I had passed the morning, I boldly repaired to Johnson. His chambers were on the first floor of No. 1, Inner Temple Lane, and I entered them with an impression given me by the Reverend Dr. Blair,<sup>8</sup> of Edinburgh, who had been introduced to him not long before, and described his having "found the giant in his den"; an expression, which, when I came to be pretty well acquainted with Johnson, I repeated to him, and he was diverted at this picturesque account of himself. Dr. Blair had been presented to him by Dr. James Fordyce.<sup>9</sup> At this time the controversy concerning the pieces published by Mr. James Macpherson, as translations of Ossian, was at its height.<sup>1</sup> Johnson had all along denied their authenticity; and, what was still more provoking to their admirers, maintained that they had no merit. The subject having been introduced by Dr. Fordyce, Dr. Blair, relying on the internal evidence of their antiquity, asked Dr. Johnson whether he thought any man of a modern age could have written such poems? Johnson replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children." Johnson, at this time, did not know that Dr. Blair had just published a dissertation, not only defending their authenticity, but seriously ranking them with the poems of Homer and Virgil; and when he was afterwards informed of this circumstance, he expressed some displeasure at Dr. Fordyce's having suggested the topic, and said, "I am not sorry that they got thus much for their pains. Sir, it was like leading one to talk of a book when the author is concealed behind the door."

He received me very courteously; but, it must be confessed that his apartment, and furniture, and morning dress, were sufficiently uncouth. His brown suit of clothes looked very rusty; he had on a little old shriveled unpowdered wig, which was too small for his head; his shirt neck and knees of his breeches were loose; his black worsted stockings ill drawn up; and he had a pair of unbuclled shoes by way of slippers. But all these slovenly particularities were forgotten the moment that he began to talk. Some gentlemen, whom I do not recollect, were sitting with him; and when they went away, I also rose; but he said to me, "Nay, don't go." "Sir," said I, "I am afraid that I intrude upon you. It is benevolent to allow me to sit and hear you." He seemed pleased with this compliment, which I sincerely paid him, and answered, "Sir, I am obliged to any man who visits me." I have preserved the following short minute of what passed this day:

"Madness frequently discovers itself merely by unnecessary deviation from the usual modes of the world. My poor friend Smart showed the disturbance of his mind by falling upon his knees, and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place. Now although, rationally speaking, it is greater madness not to pray at all than to pray as Smart did, I am afraid there are so many who do not pray, that their understanding is not called in question."

Concerning this unfortunate poet, Christopher Smart, who was confined in a madhouse, he had, at another time, the following conversation with Dr. Burney:<sup>2</sup> BURNEY. "HOW does poor Smart do, Sir; is he likely to recover?" JOHNSON. "It seems as if his mind had ceased to struggle with the disease; for he grows fat upon it." BURNEY. "Perhaps, Sir, that may be from want of exercise." JOHNSON. "NO, Sir; he has partly as much exercise as he used to have, for he digs in the garden. Indeed, before his confinement, he used for exercise to walk to the ale house; but he was carried back again. I did not think he ought to be shut up. His infirmities were not noxious to society. He insisted on people praying with him; and I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as anyone else. Another charge was that he did not love clean linen; and I have no passion for it."—Johnson continued. "Mankind have a great aversion to intellectual labor; but even supposing knowledge to be easily attainable, more people would be content to be ignorant than would take even a little trouble to acquire it."

Talking of Garrick, he said, "He is the first man in the world for sprightly conversation."

When I rose a second time he again pressed me to stay, which I did. * * *

[GOLDSMITH. SUNDRY OPINIONS. JOHNSON MEETS HIS KING]

As Dr. Oliver Goldsmith will frequently appear in this narrative, I shall endeavor to make my readers in some degree acquainted with his singular character. He was a native of Ireland, and a contemporary with Mr. Burke<sup>3</sup> at Trinity College, Dublin, but did not then give much promise of future celebrity. He, however, observed to Mr. Malone,<sup>4</sup> that "though he made no great figure in mathematics, which was a study in much repute there, he could turn an ode of Horace into English better than any of them." He afterwards studied physic<sup>5</sup> at Edinburgh, and upon the Continent; and I have been informed, was enabled to pursue his travels on foot, partly by demanding at universities to enter the lists as a disputant, by which, according to the custom of many of them, he was entitled to the premium of a crown, when luckily for him his challenge was not accepted; so that, as I once observed to Dr. Johnson, he disputed his passage through Europe. He then came to England, and was employed successively in the capacities of an usher<sup>6</sup> to an academy, a corrector of the press, a reviewer, and a writer for a newspaper. He had sagacity enough to cultivate assiduously the acquaintance of Johnson, and his faculties were gradually enlarged by the contemplation of such a model. To me and many others it appeared that he studiously copied the manner of Johnson, though, indeed, upon a smaller scale.

At this time I think he had published nothing with his name, though it was pretty generally known that one Dr. Goldsmith was the author of An Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe, and of The Citizen of the World, a series of letters supposed to be written from London by a Chinese.

4. Edmond Malone (1741-1812), distinguished editor and literary scholar. He helped Boswell in the writing and publication of the Life.

5. Medicine.

6. An assistant teacher; then a disagreeable and ill-paid job.

No man had the art of displaying, with more advantage as a writer, whatever literary acquisitions he made. "Nihil quod tetigit non ornavit."<sup>7</sup> His mind resembled a fertile, but thin soil. There was a quick, but not a strong vegetation, of whatever chanced to be thrown upon it. No deep root could be struck. The oak of the forest did not grow there; but the elegant shrubbery and the fragrant parterre<sup>8</sup> appeared in gay succession. It has been generally circulated and believed that he was a mere fool in conversation; but, in truth, this has been greatly exaggerated. He had, no doubt, a more than common share of that hurry of ideas which we often find in his countrymen, and which sometimes produces a laughable confusion in expressing them. He was very much what the French call un etourdi,<sup>9</sup> and from vanity and an eager desire of being conspicuous wherever he was, he frequently talked carelessly without knowledge of the subject, or even without thought. His person was short, his countenance coarse and vulgar, his deportment that of a scholar awkwardly affecting the easy gentleman. Those who were in any way distinguished, excited envy in him to so ridiculous an excess that the instances of it are hardly credible. When accompanying two beautiful young ladies with their mother on a tour in France, he was seriously angry that more attention was paid to them than to him; and once at the exhibition of the Fantoccini<sup>1</sup> in London, when those who sat next him observed with what dexterity a puppet was made to toss a pike, he could not bear that it should have such praise, and exclaimed with some warmth, "Pshaw! I can do it better myself." * * *

I had as my guests this evening at the Mitre Tavern, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Goldsmith, Mr. Thomas Davies, Mr. Eccles, an Irish gentleman, for whose agreeable company I was obliged to Mr. Davies, and the Reverend Mr. John Ogilvie,<sup>2</sup> who was desirous of being in company with my illustrious friend, while I, in my turn, was proud to have the honor of showing one of my countrymen upon what easy terms Johnson permitted me to live with him. * * *

Mr. Ogilvie was unlucky enough to choose for the topic of his conversation the praises of his native country. He began with saying that there was very rich land round Edinburgh. Goldsmith, who had studied physic there, contradicted this, very untruly, with a sneering laugh. Disconcerted a little by this, Mr. Ogilvie then took new ground, where, I suppose, he thought himself perfectly safe; for he observed that Scotland had a great many noble wild prospects. JOHNSON. "I believe, Sir, you have a great many. Norway, too, has noble wild prospects; and Lapland is remarkable for prodigious noble wild prospects. But, Sir, let me tell you, the noblest prospect which a Scotchman ever sees, is the highroad that leads him to England!" This unexpected and pointed sally produced a roar of applause. After all, however, those who admire the rude grandeur of nature cannot deny it to Caledonia. * * *

At night Mr. Johnson and I supped in a private room at the Turk's Head Coffeehouse, in the Strand. "I encourage this house," said he, "for the mistress of it is a good civil woman, and has not much business.

"Sir, I love the acquaintance of young people; because, in the first place, I don't like to think myself growing old. In the next place, young acquaintances must last longest, if they do last; and then, Sir, young men have more virtue than old men: they have more generous sentiments in every respect. I love the young dogs of this age: they have more wit and humor and knowledge of life than we had; but then the dogs are not so good scholars. Sir, in my early years I read very hard. It is a sad reflection, but a true one, that I knew almost as much at eighteen as I do now. My judgment, to be sure, was not so good; but I had all the facts. I remember very well, when I was at Oxford, an old gentleman said to me, 'Young man, ply your book diligently now, and acquire a stock of knowledge; for when years come upon you, you will find that poring upon books will be but an irksome task.' * * *

He again insisted on the duty of maintaining subordination of rank. "Sir, I would no more deprive a nobleman of his respect than of his money. I consider myself as acting a part in the great system of society, and I do to others as I would have them to do to me. I would behave to a nobleman as I should expect he would behave to me, were I a nobleman and he Sam. Johnson. Sir, there is one Mrs. Macaulay<sup>3</sup> in this town, a great republican. One day when I was at her house, I put on a very grave countenance, and said to her, 'Madam, I am now become a convert to your way of thinking. I am convinced that all mankind are upon an equal footing; and to give you an unquestionable proof, Madam, that I am in earnest, here is a very sensible, civil, well-behaved fellow citizen, your footman; I desire that he may be allowed to sit down and dine with us.' I thus, Sir, showed her the absurdity of the leveling doctrine.<sup>4</sup> She has never liked me since. Sir, your levelers wish to level down as far as themselves; but they cannot bear leveling up to themselves. They would all have some people under them; why not then have some people above them?" * * *

At supper this night he talked of good eating with uncommon satisfaction. "Some people," he said, "have a foolish way of not minding, or pretending not to mind, what they eat. For my part, I mind my belly very studiously, and very carefully; for I look upon it that he who does not mind his belly will hardly mind anything else." He now appeared to me Jean Bidl philosophe,<sup>5</sup> and he was, for the moment, not only serious but vehement. Yet I have heard him, upon other occasions, talk with great contempt of people who were anxious to gratify their palates; and the 206th number of his Rambler is a masterly essay against gulosity.<sup>6</sup> His practice, indeed, I must acknowledge, may be considered as casting the balance of his different opinions upon this subject; for I never knew any man who relished good eating more than he did. When at table, he was totally absorbed in the business of the moment; his looks seemed riveted to his plate; nor would he, unless when in very high company, say one word, or even pay the least attention to what was said by others, till he had satisfied his appetite, which was so fierce, and indulged with such intenseness, that while in the act of eating, the veins of his forehead swelled, and generally a strong perspiration was visible. To those whose sensations were delicate, this could not but be disgusting; and it was doubtless not very suitable to the character of a philosopher, who should be distinguished by self-command. But it must be owned that Johnson, though he could be rigidly abstemious, was not a temperate man either in eating or drinking. He could refrain, but he could not use moderately. He told me that he had fasted two days without inconvenience, and that he had never been hungry but once. They who beheld with wonder how much he eat upon all occasions when his dinner was to his taste, could not easily conceive what he must have meant by hunger; and not only was he remarkable for the extraordinary quantity which he eat, but he was, or affected to be, a man of very nice discernment in the science of cookery. * 4 *

[1767] In February, 1767, there happened one of the most remarkable incidents of Johnson's life, which gratified his monarchical enthusiasm, and which he loved to relate with all its circumstances, when requested by his friends. This was his being honored by a private conversation with his Majesty, in the library at the Queen's house. He had frequently visited those splendid rooms and noble collection of books, which he used to say was more numerous and curious than he supposed any person could have made in the time which the King had employed. Mr. Barnard, the librarian, took care that he should have every accommodation that could contribute to his ease and convenience, while indulging his literary taste in that place; so that he had here a very agreeable resource at leisure hours.

His Majesty having been informed of his occasional visits, was pleased to signify a desire that he should be told when Dr. Johnson came next to the library. Accordingly, the next time that Johnson did come, as soon as he was fairly engaged with a book, on which, while he sat by the fire, he seemed quite intent, Mr. Barnard stole round to the apartment where the King was, and, in obedience to his Majesty's commands, mentioned that Dr. Johnson was then in the library. His Majesty said he was at leisure, and would go to him; upon which Mr. Barnard took one of the candles that stood on the King's table, and lighted his Majesty through a suite of rooms, till they came to a private door into the library, of which his Majesty had the key. Being entered, Mr. Barnard stepped forward hastily to Dr. Johnson, who was still in a profound study, and whispered him, "Sir, here is the King." Johnson started up, and stood still. His Majesty approached him, and at once was courteously easy.

His Majesty began by observing that he understood he came sometimes to the library; and then mentioning his having heard that the Doctor had been lately at Oxford, asked him if he was not fond of going thither. To which Johnson answered that he was indeed fond of going to Oxford sometimes, but was likewise glad to come back again. The King then asked him what they were doing at Oxford. Johnson answered, he could not much commend their diligence, but that in some respects they were mended, for they had put their press under better regulations, and were at that time printing Polybius. He was then asked whether there were better libraries at Oxford or Cambridge. He answered, he believed the Bodleian was larger than any they had at Cambridge; at the same time adding, "I hope, whether we have more books or not than they have at Cambridge, we shall make as good use of them as they do." Being asked whether All Souls or Christ Church library was the largest, he answered, "All Souls library is the largest we have, except the Bodleian." "Aye," said the King, "that is the public library."

His Majesty inquired if he was then writing anything. He answered, he was not, for he had pretty well told the world what he knew, and must now read to acquire more knowledge. The King, as it should seem with a view to urge him to rely on his own stores as an original writer, and to continue his labors, then said "I do not think you borrow much from anybody." Johnson said he thought he had already done his part as a writer. "I should have thought so too," said the King, "if you had not written so well."—Johnson observed to me, upon this, that "No man could have paid a handsomer compliment; and it was fit for a king to pay. It was decisive." When asked by another friend, at Sir Joshua Reynolds's, whether he made any reply to this high compliment, he answered, "No, Sir. When the King had said it, it was to be so. It was not for me to bandy civilities with my sovereign." Perhaps no man who had spent his whole life in courts could have shown a more nice and dignified sense of true politeness than Johnson did in this instance. * * *

[FEAR OF DEATH]

[1769] When we were alone, I introduced the subject of death, and endeavored to maintain that the fear of it might be got over. I told him that David Hume said to me, he was no more uneasy to think he should not be after this life, than that he had not been before he began to exist. JOHNSON. "Sir, if he really thinks so, his perceptions are disturbed; he is mad: if he does not think so, he lies. He may tell you, he holds his finger in the flame of a candle, without feeling pain; would you believe him? When he dies, he at least gives up all he has." BOSWELL. "Foote,<sup>7</sup> Sir, told me, that when he was very ill he was not afraid to die." JOHNSON. "It is not true, Sir. Hold a pistol to Foote's breast, or to Hume's breast, and threaten to kill them, and you'll see how they behave." BOSWELL. "But may we not fortify our minds for the approach of death?" Here I am sensible I was in the wrong, to bring before his view what he ever looked upon with horror; for although when in a celestial frame, in his Vanity of Human Wishes, he has supposed death to be "kind Nature's signal for retreat," from this stage of being to "a happier seat," his thoughts upon this awful change were in general full of dismal apprehensions. His mind resembled the vast amphitheater, the Colosseum at Rome. In the center stood his judgment, which, like a mighty gladiator, combated those apprehensions that, like the wild beasts of the arena, were all around in cells, ready to be let out upon him. After a conflict, he drove them back into their dens; but not killing them, they were still assailing him. To my question, whether we might not fortify our minds for the approach of death, he answered, in a passion, "No, Sir, let it alone. It matters not how a man dies, but how he lives. The act of dying is not of importance, it lasts so short a time." He added (with an earnest look), "A man knows it must be so, and submits. It will do him no good to whine."

I attempted to continue the conversation. He was so provoked that he said, "Give us no more of this"; and was thrown into such a state of agitation that he expressed himself in a way that alarmed and distressed me; showed an impatience that I should leave him, and when I was going away, called to me sternly, "Don't let us meet tomorrow." * * *

[OSSIAN. "TALKING FOR VICTORY"]

MR. BOSWELL TO DR. JOHNSON

Edinburgh, Feb. 2, 1775.

* * * As to Macpherson, I am anxious to have from yourself a full and pointed account of what has passed between you and him. It is confidently told here that before your book<sup>8</sup> came out he sent to you, to let you know

7. Samuel Foote, actor and dramatist, famous for his wit and his skill in mimicry.

8. Johnson's Journey to the Western Islands

(1775), in which he had publicly expressed his views on the Ossianic poems.

that he understood you meant to deny the authenticity of Ossian's poems; that the originals were in his possession; that you might have inspection of them, and might take the evidence of people skilled in the Erse language; and that he hoped, after this fair offer, you would not be so uncan-did<sup>9</sup> as to assert that he had refused reasonable proof. That you paid no regard to his message, but published your strong attack upon him; and then he wrote a letter to you, in such terms as he thought suited to one who had not acted as a man of veracity. * * *

What words were used by Mr. Macpherson in his letter to the venerable sage, I have never heard; but they are generally said to have been of a nature very different from the language of literary contest. Dr. Johnson's answer appeared in the newspapers of the day, and has since been frequently repub-lished; but not with perfect accuracy. I give it as dictated to me by himself, written down in his presence, and authenticated by a note in his own hand-writing, "This, I think, is a true copy."

MR. JAMES MACPHERSON,

I received your foolish and impudent letter. Any violence offered me I shall do my best to repel; and what I cannot do for myself, the law shall do for me. I hope I shall never be deterred from detecting what I think a cheat, by the menaces of a ruffian.

What would you have me retract? I thought your book an imposture; I think it an imposture still. For this opinion I have given my reasons to the public, which I here dare you to refute. Your rage I defy. Your abilities, since your Homer, are not so formidable; and what I hear of your morals inclines me to pay regard not to what you shall say, but to what you shall prove. You may print this if you will.

SAM. JOHNSON.

Mr. Macpherson little knew the character of Dr. Johnson if he supposed that he could be easily intimidated; for no man was ever more remarkable for personal courage. He had, indeed, an awful dread of death, or rather, "of something after death";<sup>1</sup> and what rational man, who seriously thinks of quit-ting all that he has ever known, and going into a new and unknown state of being, can be without that dread? But his fear was from reflection; his courage natural. His fear, in that one instance, was the result of philosophical and religious consideration. He feared death, but he feared nothing else, not even what might occasion death. Many instances of his resolution may be men-tioned. One day, at Mr. Beauclerk's house in the country, when two large dogs were fighting, he went up to them, and beat them till they separated; and at another time, when told of the danger there was that a gun might burst if charged with many balls, he put in six or seven, and fired it off against a wall. Mr. Langton told me that when they were swimming together near Oxford, he cautioned Dr. Johnson against a pool which was reckoned particularly dan-gerous; upon which Johnson directly swam into it. He told me himself that one night he was attacked in the street by four men, to whom he would not yield, but kept them all at bay, till the watch came up, and carried both him and them to the roundhouse.<sup>2</sup> In the playhouse at Lichfield, as Mr. Garrick informed me, Johnson having for a moment quitted a chair which was placed for him between the side-scenes, a gentleman took possession of it, and when Johnson on his return civilly demanded his seat, rudely refused to give it up; upon which Johnson laid hold of it, and tossed him and the chair into the pit. Foote, who so successfully revived the old comedy, by exhibiting living characters, had resolved to imitate Johnson on the stage, expecting great profits from his ridicule of so celebrated a man. Johnson being informed of his intention, and being at dinner at Mr. Thomas Davies's the bookseller, from whom I had the story, he asked Mr. Davies what was the common price of an oak stick; and being answered six-pence, "Why then, Sir," said he, "give me leave to send your servant to purchase me a shilling one. I'll have a double quantity; for I am told Foote means to take me off, as he calls it, and I am determined the fellow shall not do it with impunity." Davies took care to acquaint Foote of this, which effectually checked the wantonness of the mimic. Mr. Macpherson's menaces made Johnson provide himself with the same implement of defense; and had he been attacked, I have no doubt that, old as he was, he would have made his corporal prowess be felt as much as his intellectual. <sup>4 4 4</sup>

[J 776] I mentioned a new gaming club, of which Mr. Beauclerk had given me an account, where the members played to a desperate extent. JOHNSON. "Depend upon it, Sir, this is mere talk. Who is ruined by gaming? You will not find six instances in an age. There is a strange rout made about deep play: whereas you have many more people ruined by adventurous trade, and yet we do not hear such an outcry against it." THRALE.<sup>3</sup> "There may be few people absolutely ruined by deep play; but very many are much hurt in their circumstances by it." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir, and so are very many by other kinds of expense." I had heard him talk once before in the same manner; and at Oxford he said, he wished he had learnt to play at cards. The truth, however, is that he loved to display his ingenuity in argument; and therefore would sometimes in conversation maintain opinions which he was sensible were wrong, but in supporting which, his reasoning and wit would be most conspicuous. He would begin thus: "Why, Sir, as to the good or evil of card playing" "Now," said Garrick, "he is thinking which side he shall take." He appeared to have a pleasure in contradiction, especially when any opinion whatever was delivered with an air of confidence; so that there was hardly any topic, if not one of the great truths of religion and morality, that he might not have been incited to argue, either for or against. Lord Elibank<sup>4</sup> had the highest admiration of his powers. He once observed to me, "Whatever opinion Johnson maintains, I will not say that he convinces me; but he never fails to show me that he has good reasons for it." I have heard Johnson pay his Lordship this high compliment: "I never was in Lord Elibank's company without learning something." <sup>4 4 4</sup>

3. Johnson met Henry Thrale, the wealthy brewer, and his charming wife, Hester, in 1765. Thereafter he spent much of his time at their house at Streatham near London. There he enjoyed the good things of life, as well as the companionship of Mrs.

Thrale and her children. Henry Thrale died in 1781. His widow's marriage to Gabriel Piozzi, an Italian musician, in 1784, caused Johnson to quarrel with her and darkened the last months of his life.

4. Prominent in Scottish literary circles. Johnson, who admired him, had visited him on his tour of Scotland with Boswell in 1773.

[DINNER WITH WILKES]

My worthy booksellers and friends, Messieurs Dilly in the Poultry, at whose hospitable and well-covered table I have seen a greater number of literan- men than at any other, except that of Sir Joshua Reynolds, had invited me to meet Mr. Wilkes<sup>5</sup> and some more gentlemen on Wednesday, May 15. "Pray," said I, "let us have Dr. Johnson."—"What, with Mr. Wilkes? not for the world," said Mr. Edward Dilly, "Dr. Johnson would never forgive me."—"Come," said I, "if you'll let me negotiate for you, I will be answerable that all shall go well." DILLY. "Nay, if you will take it upon you, I am sure I shall be very happy to see them both here."

Notwithstanding the high veneration which I entertained for Dr. Johnson, I was sensible that he was sometimes a little actuated by the spirit of contradiction, and by means of that I hoped I should gain my point. I was persuaded that if I had come upon him with a direct proposal, "Sir, will you dine in company with Jack Wilkes?" he would have flown into a passion, and would probably have answered, "Dine with Jack Wilkes, Sir! I'd as soon dine with Jack Ketch."<sup>6</sup> I therefore, while we were sitting quietly by ourselves at his house in an evening, took occasion to open my plan thus: "Mr. Dilly, Sir, sends his respectful compliments to you, and would be happy if you would do him the honor to dine with him on Wednesday next along with me, as I must soon go to Scotland." JOHNSON. "Sir, I am obliged to Mr. Dilly. I will wait upon him—" BOSWELL. "Provided, Sir, I suppose, that the company which he is to have, is agreeable to you." JOHNSON. "What do you mean, Sir? What do you take me for? Do you think I am so ignorant of the world as to imagine that I am to prescribe to a gentleman what company he is to have at his table?" BOSWELL. "I beg your pardon, Sir, for wishing to prevent you from meeting people whom you might not like. Perhaps he may have some of what he calls his patriotic<sup>7</sup> friends with him." JOHNSON. "Well, Sir, and what then? What care I for his patriotic friends? Poh!" BOSWELL. "I should not be surprised to find Jack Wilkes there." JOHNSON. "And if Jack Wilkes shoidd be there, what is that to me, Sir? My dear friend, let us have no more of this. I am sorry to be angry with you; but really it is treating me strangely to talk to me as if I could not meet any company whatever, occasionally." BOSWELL. "Pray forgive me, Sir: I meant well. But you shall meet whoever comes, for me." Thus I secured him, and told Dilly that he would find him very well pleased to be one of his guests on the day appointed.

Upon the much-expected Wednesday, I called on him about half an hour before dinner, as I often did when we were to dine out together, to see that he was ready in time, and to accompany him. I found him buffeting his books, as upon a former occasion, covered with dust, and making no preparation for going abroad. "How is this, Sir?" said I. "Don't you recollect that you are to dine at Mr. Dilly's?" JOHNSON. "Sir, I did not think of going to Dilly's: it went

5. John Wilkes (1727—1797) was disapproved of by the Christian and Tory Johnson in every way. He was profane and dissolute, and his personal life was a public scandal. For more than a decade he had been notorious as a courageous and resourceful opponent of the authoritarian policies of the king and his ministers and had been the envenomed critic of Lord Bute, to whom Johnson owed his pension. When Johnson met him he had totally defeated his enemies, had served as lord mayor, and was again a member of Parliament, a post from which he had been expelled and driven into exile as an outlaw in 1764. Boswell had found Wilkes a gay and congenial companion in Italy in 1764.

7. In Tory circles the word had come to be used ironically of those who opposed the government. The "patriots" considered themselves the defenders of the ancient liberties of the English. They included the partisans of both Wilkes and the American colonists.

out of my head. I have ordered dinner at home with Mrs. Williams." BOSWELL. "But, my dear Sir, you know you were engaged to Mr. Dilly, and I told him so. He will expect you, and will be much disappointed if you don't come." JOHNSON. "YOU must talk to Mrs. Williams about this."

Here was a sad dilemma. I feared that what I was so confident I had secured would yet be frustrated. He had accustomed himself to show Mrs. Williams such a degree of humane attention as frequently imposed some restraint upon him; and I knew that if she should be obstinate, he would not stir. I hastened downstairs to the blind lady's room, and told her I was in great uneasiness, for Dr. Johnson had engaged to me to dine this day at Mr. Dilly's, but that he had told me he had forgotten his engagement, and had ordered dinner at home. "Yes, Sir," said she, pretty peevishly, "Dr. Johnson is to dine at home."—"Madam," said I, "his respect for you is such that I know he will not leave you unless you absolutely desire it. But as you have so much of his company, I hope you will be good enough to forgo it for a day; as Mr. Dilly is a very worthy man, has frequently had agreeable parties at his house for Dr. Johnson, and will be vexed if the Doctor neglects him today. And then, Madam, be pleased to consider my situation; I carried the message, and I assured Mr. Dilly that Dr. Johnson was to come, and no doubt he has made a dinner, and invited a company, and boasted of the honor he expected to have. I shall be quite disgraced if the Doctor is not there." She gradually softened to my solicitations, which were certainly as earnest as most entreaties to ladies upon any occasion, and was graciously pleased to empower me to tell Dr. Johnson that all things considered, she thought he should certainly go. I flew back to him, still in dust, and careless of what should be the event, "indifferent in his choice to go or stay";<sup>8</sup> but as soon as I had announced to him Mrs. Williams' consent, he roared, "Frank, a clean shirt," and was very soon dressed. When I had him fairly seated in a hackney coach with me, I exulted as much as a fortune hunter who has got an heiress into a post chaise with him to set out for Gretna Green.<sup>9</sup>

When we entered Mr. Dilly's drawing room, he found himself in the midst of a company he did not know. I kept myself snug and silent, watching how he would conduct himself. I observed him whispering to Mr. Dilly, "Who is that gentleman, Sir?"—"Mr. Arthur Lee."—JOHNSON. "Too, too, too" (under his breath), which was one of his habitual mutterings. Mr. Arthur Lee could not but be very obnoxious to Johnson, for he was not only a patriot but an American.<sup>1</sup> He was afterwards minister from the United States at the court of Madrid. "And who is the gentleman in lace?"—"Mr. Wilkes, Sir." This information confounded him still more; he had some difficulty to restrain himself, and taking up a book, sat down upon a window seat and read, or at least kept his eye upon it intently for some time, till he composed himself. His feelings, I dare say, were awkward enough. But he no doubt recollected his having rated rne for supposing that he could be at all disconcerted by any company, and he, therefore, resolutely set himself to behave quite as an easy man of the world, who could adapt himself at once to the disposition and manners of those whom he might chance to meet.

The cheering sound of "Dinner is upon the table," dissolved his reverie, and we all sat down without any symptom of ill humor. There were present, beside Mr. Wilkes, and Mr. Arthur Lee, who was an old companion of mine when he studied physic at Edinburgh, Mr. (now Sir John) Miller, Dr. Lettsom, and Mr. Slater the druggist. Mr. Wilkes placed himself next to Dr. Johnson, and behaved to him with so much attention and politeness that he gained upon him insensibly. No man eat more heartily than Johnson, or loved better what was nice and delicate. Mr. Wilkes was very assiduous in helping him to some fine veal. "Pray give me leave, Sir—It is better here—A little of the brown—Some fat, Sir—A little of the stuffing—Some gravy—Let me have the pleasure of giving you some butter—Allow me to recommend a squeeze of this orange—or the lemon, perhaps, may have more zest."—"Sir, Sir, I am obliged to you, Sir," cried Johnson, bowing, and turning his head to him with a look for some time of "surly virtue," but, in a short while, of complacency.

Foote being mentioned, Johnson said, "He is not a good mimic." One of the company added, "A merry Andrew, a buffoon." JOHNSON. "But he has wit too, and is not deficient in ideas, or in fertility and variety of imagery, and not empty of reading; he has knowledge enough to fill up his part. One species of wit he has in an eminent degree, that of escape. You drive him into a corner with both hands; but he's gone, Sir, when you think you have got him—like an animal that jumps over your head. Then he has a great range for wit; he never lets truth stand between him and a jest, and he is sometimes mighty coarse. Garrick is under many restraints from which Foote is free." WILKES. "Garrick's wit is more like Lord Chesterfield's." JOHNSON. "The first time I was in company with Foote was at Fitzherbert's. Having no good opinion of the fellow, I was resolved not to be pleased; and it is very difficult to please a man against his will. I went on eating my dinner pretty sullenly, affecting not to mind him. But the dog was so very comical, that I was obliged to lay down my knife and fork, throw myself back upon my chair, and fairly laugh it out. No, Sir, he was irresistible. He upon one occasion experienced, in an extraordinary degree, the efficacy of his powers of entertaining. Amongst the many and various modes which he tried of getting money, he became a partner with a small-beer<sup>2</sup> brewer, and he was to have a share of the profits for procuring customers amongst his numerous acquaintance. Fitzherbert was one who took his small beer; but it was so bad that the servants resolved not to drink it. They were at some loss how to notify their resolution, being afraid of offending their master, who they knew liked Foote much as a companion. At last they fixed upon a little black boy, who was rather a favorite, to be their deputy, and deliver their remonstrance; and having invested him with the whole authority of the kitchen, he was to inform Mr. Fitzherbert, in all their names, upon a certain day, that they would drink Foote's small beer no longer. On that day Foote happened to dine at Fitzherbert's, and this boy served at table; he was so delighted with Foote's stories, and merriment, and grimace, that when he went downstairs, he told them, 'This is the finest man I have ever seen. I will not deliver your message. I will drink his small beer.' "

Somebody observed that Garrick could not have done this. WILKES. "Garrick would have made the small beer still smaller. He is now leaving the stage; but he will play Scrub<sup>3</sup> all his life." I knew that Johnson would let nobody attack Garrick but himself, as Garrick once said to me, and I had heard him praise his liberality; so to bring out his commendation of his celebrated pupil, I said, loudly, "I have heard Garrick is liberal." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir, I know that Garrick has given away more money than any man in England that I am acquainted with, and that not from ostentatious views. Garrick was very poor when he began life; so when he came to have money, he probably was very unskillful in giving away, and saved when he should not. But Garrick began to be liberal as soon as he could; and I am of opinion, the reputation of avarice which he has had, has been very lucky for him, and prevented his having many enemies. You despise a man for avarice, but do not hate him. Garrick might have been much better attacked for living with more splendor than is suitable to a player: if they had had the wit to have assaulted him in that quarter, they might have galled him more. But they have kept clamoring about his avarice, which has rescued him from much obloquy and envy."

Talking of the great difficulty of obtaining authentic information for biography, Johnson told us, "When I was a young fellow I wanted to write the Life of Dr'den, and in order to get materials, I applied to the only two persons then alive who had seen him; these were old Swinney,<sup>4</sup> and old Cibber. Swinney's information was no more than this, that at Will's Coffeehouse Dryden had a particular chair for himself, which was set by the fire in winter, and was then called his winter chair; and that it was carried out for him to the balcony in summer, and was then called his summer chair. Cibber could tell no more but that he remembered him a decent old man, arbiter of critical disputes at Will's. You are to consider that Cibber was then at a great distance from Dryden, had perhaps one leg only in the room, and durst not draw in the other." BOSWELL. "Yet Cibber was a man of observation?" JOHNSON. "I think not." BOSWELL. "YOU will allow his Apology to be well done." JOHNSON. "Very well done, to be sure, Sir. That book is a striking proof of the justice of Pope's remark:

Each might his several province well command,
Would all but stoop to what they understand."<sup>5</sup>

BOSWELL. "And his plays are good." JOHNSON. "Yes; but that was his trade; Vesprit du corps: he had been all his life among players and play writers. I wondered that he had so little to say in conversation, for he had kept the best company, and learnt all that can be got by the ear. He abused Pindar to me, and then showed me an ode of his own, with an absurd couplet, making a linnet soar on an eagle's wing. I told him that when the ancients made a simile, they always made it like something real."

Mr. Wilkes remarked that "among all the bold flights of Shakespeare's imagination, the boldest was making Birnam Wood march to Dunsinane;<sup>6</sup> creating a wood where there never was a shrub; a wood in Scotland! ha! ha! ha!" And he also observed, that "the clannish slavery of the Highlands of Scotland was the single exception to Milton's remark of 'The mountain nymph, sweet Liberty,<sup>7</sup> being worshiped in all hilly countries.'"—"When I was at Inverary," said he, "on a visit to my old friend, Archibald, Duke of Argyle, his dependents congratulated me on being such a favorite of his Grace. I said, 'It is then, gentlemen, truly lucky for me; for if I had displeased the Duke, and he had

Mr. Arthur Lee mentioned some Scotch who had taken possession of a barren part of America, and wondered why they should choose it. JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, all barrenness is comparative. The Scotch would not know it to be barren." BOSWELL. "Come, come, he is flattering the English. You have now been in Scotland, Sir, and say if you did not see meat and drink enough there." JOHNSON. "Why yes, Sir; meat and drink enough to give the inhabitants sufficient strength to run away from home." All these quick and lively sallies were said sportively, quite in jest, and with a smile, which showed that he meant only wit. Upon this topic he and Mr. Wilkes could perfectly assimilate; here was a bond of union between them, and I was conscious that as both of them had visited Caledonia, both were fully satisfied of the strange narrow ignorance of those who imagine that it is a land of famine. But they amused themselves with persevering in the old jokes. When I claimed a superiority for Scotland over England in one respect, that no man can be arrested there for a debt merely because another swears it against him; but there must first be the judgment of a court of law ascertaining its justice; and that a seizure of the person, before judgment is obtained, can take place only if his creditor should swear that he is about to fly from the country, or, as it is technically expressed, is in meditation figae: WILKES. "That, I should think, may be safely sworn of all the Scotch nation." JOHNSON (to Mr. Wilkes). "You must know, Sir, I lately took my friend Boswell and showed him genuine civilized life in an English provincial town. I turned him loose at Lichfield, my native city, that he might see for once real civility: for you know he lives among savages in Scotland, and among rakes in London." WILKES. "Except when he is with grave, sober, decent people like you and me." JOHNSON (smiling). "And we ashamed of him."

They were quite frank and easy. Johnson told the story of his asking Mrs. Macaulay to allow her footman to sit down with them, to prove the ridiculousness of the argument for the equality of mankind; and he said to me afterwards, with a nod of satisfaction, "You saw Mr. Wilkes acquiesced."<sup>44</sup> *

This record, though by no means so perfect as I could wish, will serve to give a notion of a very curious interview, which was not only pleasing at the time, but had the agreeable and benignant effect of reconciling any animosity and sweetening any acidity, which in the various bustle of political contest, had been produced in the minds of two men, who, though widely different, had so many things in common—classical learning, modern literature, wit, and humor, and ready repartee—that it would have been much to be regretted if they had been forever at a distance from each other.

Mr. Burke gave me much credit for this successful "negotiation"; and pleasantly said that there was nothing to equal it in the whole history of the Corps Diplomatique.<sup>444</sup> upon the supposition of happiness; grand houses were built, fine gardens were made, splendid places of public amusement were contrived, and crowded with company. JOHNSON. "Alas, Sir, these are all only struggles for happiness. When I first entered Ranelagh,<sup>1</sup> it gave an expansion and gay sensation to my mind, such as I never experienced anywhere else. But, as Xerxes wept when he viewed his immense army, and considered that not one of that great multitude would be alive a hundred years afterwards, so it went to my heart to consider that there was not one in all that brilliant circle that was not afraid to go home and think; but that the thoughts of each individual there, would be distressing when alone." * 4 *

[ "A BOTTOM OF GOOD SENSE." BET FLINT. "CLEAR YOUR MIND OF CANT" ]

[J781] Talking of a very respectable author, he told us a curious circumstance in his life, which was that he had married a printer's devil.<sup>2</sup> REYNOLDS. "A printer's devil, Sir! Why, I thought a printer's devil was a creature with a black face and in rags." JOHNSON. "Yes, Sir. But I suppose, he had her face washed, and put clean clothes on her." Then looking very serious, and very earnest: "And she did not disgrace him; the woman had a bottom of good sense." The word bottom thus introduced was so ludicrous when contrasted with his gravity, that most of us could not forbear tittering and laughing; though I recollect that the Bishop of Killaloe kept his countenance with perfect steadiness, while Miss Hannah More<sup>3</sup> slyly hid her face behind a lady's back who sat on the same settee with her. His pride could not bear that any expression of his should excite ridicule, when he did not intend it; he therefore resolved to assume and exercise despotic power, glanced sternly around, and called out in a strong tone, "Where's the merriment?" Then collecting himself, and looking awful, to make us feel how he could impose restraint, and as it were searching his mind for a still more ludicrous word, he slowly pronounced, "I say the xvoman was fundamentally sensible"; as if he had said, "hear this now, and laugh if you dare." We all sat composed as at a funeral. 4 4 4

He gave us an entertaining account of Bet Flint, a woman of the town, who, with some eccentric talents and much effrontery, forced herself upon his acquaintance. "Bet," said he, "wrote her own Life in verse, which she brought to me, wishing that I would furnish her with a Preface to it" (laughing). "I used to say of her that she was generally slut and drunkard; occasionally, whore and thief. She had, however, genteel lodgings, a spinnet on which she played, and a boy that walked before her chair. Poor Bet was taken up on a charge of stealing a counterpane, and tried at the Old Bailey. Chief Justice _____, who loved a wench, summed up favorably, and she was acquitted. After which Bet said, with a gay and satisfied air, 'Now that the counterpane is my own, I shall make a petticoat of it.' " 4 4 4

[1783] I have no minute of any interview with Johnson till Thursday, May 15, when I find what follows: BOSWELL. "I wish much to be in Parliament, Sir." JOHNSON. "Why, Sir, unless you come resolved to support any administration, you would be the worse for being in Parliament, because you would be obliged to live more expensively." BOSWELL. "Perhaps, Sir, I should be the less happy for being in Parliament. I never would sell my vote, and I should be vexed if things went wrong." JOHNSON. "That's cant,<sup>4</sup> Sir. It would not vex you more in the house than in the gallery: public affairs vex no man." BOSWELL. "Have not they vexed yourself a little, Sir? Have not you been vexed by all the turbulence of this reign, and by that absurd vote of the House of Commons, 'That the influence of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished?' " JOHNSON. "Sir, I have never slept an hour less, nor eat an ounce less meat. I would have knocked the factious dogs on the head, to be sure; but I was not vexed." BOSWELL. "I declare, Sir, upon my honor, I did imagine I was vexed, and took a pride in it; but it was, perhaps, cant; for I own I neither ate less, nor slept less." JOHNSON. "My dear friend, clear your mind of cant. You may talk as other people do: you may say to a man, 'Sir, I am your most humble servant.' You are not his most humble servant. You may say, 'These are bad times; it is a melancholy thing to be reserved to such times.' You don't mind the times. You tell a man, 'I am sorry you had such bad weather the last day of your journey, and were so much wet.' You don't care sixpence whether he is wet or dry. You may talk in this manner; it is a mode of talking in society: but don't think foolishly." * * *

[JOHNSON PREPARES FOR DEATH]

My anxious apprehensions at parting with him this year proved to be but too well founded; for not long afterwards he had a dreadful stroke of the palsy, of which there are very full and accurate accounts in letters written by himself, to show with what composure of mind, and resignation to the Divine Will, his steady piety enabled him to behave. * * *

Two days after he wrote thus to Mrs. Thrale:

"On Monday, the 16th, I sat for my picture, and walked a considerable way with little inconvenience. In the afternoon and evening I felt myself light and easy, and began to plan schemes of life. Thus I went to bed, and in a short time waked and sat up, as has been long my custom, when I felt a confusion and indistinctness in my head, which lasted, I suppose, about half a minute. I was alarmed, and prayed God that however he might afflict my body, he would spare my understanding. This prayer, that I might try the integrity of my faculties, I made in Latin verse. The lines were not very good, but I knew them not to be very good: I made them easily, and concluded myself to be unimpaired in my faculties.

"Soon after I perceived that I had suffered a paralytic stroke, and that my speech was taken from me. I had no pain, and so little dejection in this dreadful state, that I wondered at my own apathy, and considered that perhaps death itself, when it should come, would excite less horror than seems now to attend it.

"In order to rouse the vocal organs, I took two drams. Wine has been celebrated for the production of eloquence. I put myself into violent motion, and I think repeated it; but all was vain. I then went to bed and strange as it may seem, I think, slept. When I saw light, it was time to contrive what I should do. Though God stopped my speech, he left me my hand; I enjoyed a mercy which was not granted to my dear friend Lawrence,<sup>5</sup> who now perhaps overlooks me as I am writing, and rejoices that I have what he wanted. My first note was necessarily to my servant, who came in talking, and could not immediately comprehend why he should read what I put into his hands.

"I then wrote a card to Mr. Allen,<sup>6</sup> that I might have a discreet friend at hand, to act as occasion should require. In penning this note, I had some difficulty; my hand, I knew not how nor why, made wrong letters. I then wrote to Dr. Taylor to come to me, and bring Dr. Heberden; and I sent to Dr. Brocldesby, who is my neighbor.<sup>7</sup> My physicians are very friendly, and give me great hopes; but you may imagine my situation. I have so far recovered my vocal powers as to repeat the Lord's Prayer with no very imperfect articulation. My memory, I hope, yet remains as it was; but such an attack produces solicitude for the safety of every faculty."

[i 784] To Mr. Henry White, a young clergyman, with whom he now formed an intimacy, so as to talk to him with great freedom, he mentioned that he could not in general accuse himself of having been an undutiful son. "Once, indeed," said he, "I was disobedient; I refused to attend my father to Uttoxeter market. Pride was the source of that refusal, and the remembrance of it was painful. A few years ago, I desired to atone for this fault; I went to Uttoxeter in very bad weather, and stood for a considerable time bareheaded in the rain, on the spot where my father's stall used to stand. In contrition I stood, and I hope the penance was expiatory."

"I told him," says Miss Seward,<sup>8</sup> "in one of my latest visits to him, of a wonderful learned pig, which I had seen at Nottingham; and which did all that we have observed exhibited by dogs and horses. The subject amused him. 'Then,' said he, 'the pigs are a race unjustly calumniated. Pig has, it seems, not been wanting to man, but man to pig. We do not allow time for his education, we kill him at a year old.' Mr. Henry White, who was present, observed that if this instance had happened in or before Pope's time, he would not have been justified in instancing the swine as the lowest degree of groveling instinct.<sup>9</sup> Dr. Johnson seemed pleased with the observation, while the person who made it proceeded to remark that great torture must have been employed, ere the indocility of the animal could have been subdued. 'Certainly,' said the Doctor; 'but,' turning to me, 'how old is your pig?' I told him, three years old. 'Then,' said he, 'the pig has no cause to complain; he would have been killed the first year if he had not been educated, and protracted existence is a good recompense for very considerable degrees of torture.' "

[JOHNSON FACES DEATH]

As Johnson had now very faint hopes of recovery, and as Mrs. Thrale was no longer devoted to him, it might have been supposed that he would naturally have chosen to remain in the comfortable house of his beloved wife's daughter,<sup>1</sup> and end his life where he began it. But there was in him an animated and lofty spirit, and however complicated diseases might depress ordinary mortals, all who saw him, beheld and acknowledged the invictum animum Catonis.<sup>2</sup> Such was his intellectual ardor even at this time that he said to one friend, "Sir, I look upon every day to be lost, in which I do not make a new acquaintance"; and to another, when talking of his illness, "I will be conquered; I will not capitulate." And such was his love of London, so high a relish had he of its magnificent extent, and variety of intellectual entertainment, that he languished when absent from it, his mind having become quite luxurious from the long habit of enjoying the metropolis; and, therefore, although at Lichfield, surrounded with friends, who loved and revered him, and for whom he had a very sincere affection, he still found that such conversation as London affords, could be found nowhere else. These feelings, joined, probably, to some flattering hopes of aid from the eminent physicians and surgeons in London, who kindly and generously attended him without accepting fees, made him resolve to return to the capital. * * * Death had always been to him an object of terror; so that, though by no means happy, he still clung to life with an eagerness at which many have wondered. At any time when he was ill, he was very much pleased to be told that he looked better. An ingenious member of the Eumelian Club<sup>3</sup> informs me that upon one occasion when he said to him that he saw health returning to his cheek, Johnson seized him by the hand and exclaimed, "Sir, you are one of the kindest friends I ever had." * * *

Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Warren, and Dr. Butter, physicians, generously attended him, without accepting any fees, as did Mr. Cruikshank, surgeon; and all that could be done from professional skill and ability was tried, to prolong a life so truly valuable. He himself, indeed, having, on account of his very bad constitution, been perpetually applying himself to medical inquiries, united his own efforts with those of the gentlemen who attended him; and imagining that the dropsical collection of water which oppressed him might be drawn off by making incisions in his body, he, with his usual resolute defiance of pain, cut deep, when he thought that his surgeon had done it too tenderly.

About eight or ten days before his death, when Dr. Brocklesby paid him his morning visit, he seemed very low and desponding, and said, "I have been as a dying man all night." He then emphatically broke out in the words of Shakespeare:

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
And with some sweet oblivious antidote
Cleanse the stuffed bosom of that perilous stuff
Which weighs upon the heart?"

To which Dr. Brocklesby readily answered, from the same great poet:

"—Therein the patient
Must minister to himself."<sup>4</sup>

Johnson expressed himself much satisfied with the application. * * *

Amidst the melancholy clouds which hung over the dying Johnson, his characteristic manner showed itself on different occasions.

When Dr. Warren, in the usual style, hoped that he was better; his answer was, "No, Sir; you cannot conceive with what acceleration I advance towards death."

A man whom he had never seen before was employed one night to sit up with him. Being asked next morning how he liked his attendant, his answer was, "Not at all. Sir: the fellow's an idiot; he is as awkward as a turnspit' when first put into the wheel, and as sleepy as a dormouse."

Mr. Windham<sup>6</sup> having placed a pillow conveniently to support him, he thanked him for his kindness, and said, "That will do—all that a pillow can do."

Johnson, with that native fortitude, which, amidst all his bodily distress and mental sufferings, never forsook him, asked Dr. Brocklesby, as a man in whom he had confidence, to tell him plainly whether he could recover. "Give me," said he, "a direct answer." The Doctor having first asked him if he could bear the whole truth, which way soever it might lead, and being answered that he could, declared that, in his opinion, he could not recover without a miracle. "Then," said Johnson, "I will take no more physic, not even my opiates; for I have prayed that I may render up my soul to God unclouded." In this resolution he persevered, and, at the same time, used only the weakest kinds of sustenance. Being pressed by Mr. Windham to take somewhat more generous nourishment, lest too low a diet should have the very effect which he dreaded, by debilitating his mind, he said, "I will take anything but inebriating sustenance."

The Reverend Mr. Strahan,<sup>7</sup> who was the son of his friend, and had been always one of his great favorites, had, during his last illness, the satisfaction of contributing to soothe and comfort him. That gentleman's house, at Islington, of which he is Vicar, afforded Johnson, occasionally and easily, an agreeable change of place and fresh air; and he attended also upon him in town in the discharge of the sacred offices of his profession.

Mr. Strahan has given me the agreeable assurance that, after being in much agitation, Johnson became quite composed, and continued so till his death.

Dr. Brocklesby, who will not be suspected of fanaticism, obliged me with the following account:

"For some time before his death, all his fears were calmed and absorbed by the prevalence of his faith, and his trust in the merits and propitiation of Jesus Christ." * * *

Johnson having thus in his mind the true Christian scheme, at once rational and consolatory, uniting justice and mercy in the Divinity, with the improvement of human nature, previous to his receiving the Holy Sacrament in his apartment, composed and fervently uttered this prayer:

"Almighty and most merciful Father, I am now as to human eyes, it seems, about to commemorate, for the last time, the death of thy Son Jesus Christ, our Saviour and Redeemer. Grant, O Lord, that my whole hope and confidence may be in his merits, and thy mercy; enforce and accept my imperfect repentance; make this commemoration available to the confirmation of my faith, the establishment of my hope, and the enlargement of my charity; and make the death of thy Son Jesus Christ effectual to my redemption. Have mercy upon me, and pardon the multitude of my offenses. Bless my friends; have mercy upon all men. Support me, by thy Holy Spirit, in the days of weakness, and at the hour of death; and receive me, at my death, to everlasting happiness, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen."

Having * * * made his will on the 8th and 9th of December, and settled all his worldly affairs, he languished till Monday, the 13th of that month, when he expired, about seven o'clock in the evening, with so little apparent pain that his attendants hardly perceived when his dissolution took place. * * *

1752-1840

People have often made the mistake of underestimating Frances Burney. In person, as in her writing, she seemed a proper, self-effacing lady. Many readers still call her "Fanny," as if familiarity could make her harmless. But she saw through such poses. Sir Joshua Reynolds said that "if he was conscious to himself of any trick, or any affectation, there is nobody he should so much fear as this little Burney!" And Samuel Johnson teased her by claiming that "your shyness, & slyness, & pretending to know nothing, never took me in, whatever you may do with others. I always knew you for a toadling!" (according to legend, little toads may look submissive but actually carry poison). Although her writing crackles with humor, it can be relentless—and sometimes cruel—in exposing bad manners or a selfish heart.

She learned quite young how to hide in a crowd. A devoted daughter of Charles Burney, a popular teacher and historian of music, Frances grew up in a large family that gave her many opportunities to study character and mix discreetly in society. Her first novel, Evelina, or A Young Lady's Entrance into the World (1778), was written in secret and published anonymously. But delighted readers, including Johnson, Burke, and Hester Thrale, soon found her out and sang her praises; and a second novel, Cecilia (1782), confirmed her reputation. Her home life was less happy, however; she and her stepmother disliked each other, and she fell in love with a young clergyman who never got around to proposing. In 1786, to please her father, she accepted a place as a lady-in-waiting at court, where the paralyzing etiquette and lack of independence tormented her for the next five years, until she finally managed to resign. At forty-one she married a French emigre, General Alexandre-Gabriel-Jean-Baptiste d'Arblay. Despite the disapproval of her father—d'Arblay was penniless, Catholic, and politically liberal—the marriage was happy. Madame d'Arblay soon bore a son, and her novel Camilla (1796) brought in good money. After she joined her husband in France, in 1802, the Napoleonic wars prevented them from returning to England for ten years; the pain of an outcast dominates her last novel, The Wanderer, or Female Difficulties (1814). But she never stopped writing, producing a doctored version of her father's Memoirs (1832) and more of the diaries and letters that, edited after her death by a niece, made her famous again.

Burney wrote all her life—not only novels and plays but perpetual letters and journals, recording whatever she saw for friends and family as well as herself. Even the most informal pages display her gifts: a knack for catching character, a wonderful ear for dialogue, wry humor, and a swift pace that carries the reader along from moment to moment. Her special subject is embarrassment—often her own. In scenes like her flight from the king, where she is torn between opposite notions of the right thing to do, shame and comedy mingle. These trepidations can also be incredibly painful, as in her gripping account of a mastectomy. (For more selections from Burney's journals, go to Norton Literature Online.) Despite her propriety, Burney looks at the world and its institutions with the clear eyes of an outsider, aware of the gaps between what people say and what they do. She frees herself to write with utter honesty by pretending, at first, that nobody is going to read her. But her private thoughts are reported so fully and faithfully that, in the end, every reader can share them.

From The Journal and Letters

[FIRST JOURNAL ENTRY]

Poland Street, London, March 27, 1768'

To have some account of my thoughts, manners, acquaintance & actions, when the hour arrives in which time is more nimble than memory, is the reason which induces me to keep a journal: a journal in which I must confess my every thought, must open my whole heart! But a thing of this kind ought to be addressed to somebody—I must imagine myself to be talking—talking to the most intimate of friends—to one in whom I should take delight in confiding, & remorse in concealment: but who must this friend be?—to make choice of one to whom I can but *half*rely, would be to frustrate entirely the intention of my plan. The only one I could wholly, totally confide in, lives in the same house with me, & not only never has, but never will, leave me one secret to tell her.<sup>2</sup> To whom, then, must I dedicate my wonderful, surprising & interesting adventures?—to whom dare I reveal my private opinion of my nearest relations? the secret thoughts of my dearest friends? my own hopes, fears, reflections & dislikes?—Nobody!

To Nobody, then, will I write my journal! since to Nobody can I be wholly unreserved—to Nobody can I reveal every thought, every wish of my heart, with the most unlimited confidence, the most unremitting sincerity to the end of my life! For what chance, what accident can end my connections with Nobody? No secret can I conceal from No—body, & to No—body can I be ever unreserved. Disagreement cannot stop our affection, time itself has no power to end our friendship. The love, the esteem I entertain for Nobody, Nobody's self has not power to destroy. From Nobody I have nothing to fear, the secrets sacred to friendship, Nobody will not reveal, when the affair is doubtful, Nobody will not look towards the side least favorable—.

I will suppose you, then, to be my best friend; tho' God forbid you ever should! my dearest companion—& a romantick girl, for mere oddity may perhaps be more sincere—more tender—than if you were a friend in propria personae<sup>3</sup>—in as much as imagination often exceeds reality. In your breast my errors may create pity without exciting contempt; may raise your compassion, without eradicating your love.

From this moment, then, my dear girl—but why, permit me to ask, must a

[MR. BARLOW'S PROPOSAL]

May 28, 1775

About 2 o'clock, while I was dawdling in the study, & waiting for an opportunity to speak, we heard a rap at the door—& soon after, John came up, & said "A gentleman is below, who asks for Miss Burney,—Mr. Barlow."<sup>4</sup>

I think I was never more mad in my life—to have taken pains to avoid a private conversation so highly disagreeable to me, & at last to be forced into it at so unfavorable a juncture,—for I had now 2 letters from him, both unanswered & consequently open to his conjectures. I exclaimed "Lord!—how provoking! what shall I do?"

My father looked uneasy & perplexed:—he said something about not being hasty, which I did not desire him to explain, but only said as I left the room—

"Well, I must soon tell him I have answered his letter, & so send one tomorrow, & let him think it kept at the post office." In this determination, I went down stairs.—I saw my mother pass into the back parlor; which did not add to the graciousness of my reception of poor Mr. Barlow, who I found alone in the parlor. I was not sorry that none of the family were there, as I now began to seriously dread any protraction of this affair.

He came up to me, & with an air of tenderness & satisfaction, began some anxious enquiries about my health, but I interrupted him with saying "I fancy, sir, You have not received a letter I have written to you—I—"

"A letter?—no, ma'am!"

"You will have it, then, tomorrow, sir."

We were both silent for a minute or two, when he said, "In consequence, I presume, ma'am, of the one I—"

"Yes, sir!" cried I.

"And pray—ma'am—Miss Burney!—may I—beg to ask the contents? that is—the—the—" he could not go on.

"Sir—I—it was only—it was merely—in short, you will see it tomorrow."

"But if you would favor me with the contents now, I could perhaps answer it at once?"

"Sir, it requires no answer!"

A second silence ensued. I was really distressed myself to see his distress, which was very apparent. After some time, he stammered out something of hoping—& beseeching,—which, gathering more firmness, I announced—"I am much obliged to you, sir, for the great opinion you are pleased to have of me—but I should be sorry you should lose any more time upon my account—as I have no thoughts at all of changing my situation."

.. s s

He remonstrated very earnestly. "This is the severest decision!—I am persuaded, madam, you cannot be so cruel?—Surely you must allow that the social state is what we were all meant for?—that we were created for one

4. Thomas Barlow had met Burney early in May and immediately wrote to declare that he loved and admired her. She did not reciprocate his feelings: "his language is stiff & uncommon, he has a great desire to please, but no elegance of manners; neither, though he may be very worthy, is he at all agreeable." Her family, however, approved of the match and encouraged her to accept him.

another?—that to form such a resolution is contrary to the design of our being?—"

"All this may be true,—" said I;—"I have nothing to say in contradiction to it—but you know there are many odd characters in the world—& I am one of them."

"O no, no, no,—that can never be!—but is it possible you can have so bad an opinion of the married state? It seems to me the only state for happiness!—"

"Well, sir, you are attached to the married life—I am to the single—therefore, every man in his humor<sup>5</sup>—do you follow your opinion,—& let me follow mine."

"But surely—is not this—singular?—"

"I give you leave, sir," cried I, laughing, "to think me singular—odd—queer—nay, even whimsical, if you please."

"But, my dear Miss Burney, only—"

"I entreat you, sir, to take my answer—you really pain me by being so urgent.—"

"That would not I do for the world!—I only beg you to suffer me—perhaps in future—"

"No, indeed; I shall never change—I do assure you you will find me very obstinate!"

He began to lament his own destiny. I grew extremely tired of saying so often the same thing;—but I could not absolutely turn him out of the house, & indeed he seemed so dejected & unhappy, that I made it my study to soften my refusal as much as I could without leaving room for future expectation.

About this time, my mother came in. We both rose.—I was horridly provoked at my situation—

"I am only come in for a letter," cried she,—"pray don't let me disturb you.—" & away she went.

Very obliging indeed!

She was no sooner gone, than Mr. Barlow began again the same story, & seemed determined not to give up his cause. He hoped, at least, that I would allow him to enquire after my health?—

"I must beg you, sir, to send me no more letters."

He seemed much hurt.

"You had better, sir, think of me no more—if you study your own happiness—"

"I do study my own happiness—more than I have ever had any probability of doing before—!"

"You have made an unfortunate choice, sir; but you will find it easier to forget it than you imagine. You have only to suppose I was not at Mr. Burney's on May Day—& it was a mere chance my being there—& then you will be—"

"But if I coidd—could I also forget seeing you at old Mrs. Burney's?—and if I did—can I forget that I see you now?—"

"O yes!—in 3 months time you may forget you ever knew me. You will not find it so difficult a task as you suppose."

"You have heard, ma'am, of an old man being growed young?—perhaps you believe that?—But you will not deny me leave to sometimes see you?—"

"My father, sir, is seldom,—hardly ever, indeed, at home—"

"I have never seen the Doctor—but I hope he would not refuse me permission to enquire after your health? I have no wish without his consent."

"Though I acknowledge myself to be singular, I would not have you think me either affected or trifling,—& therefore I must assure you that I am fixed in the answer I have given you; unalterably fixed."

s * s

He then took his leave:—returned back—took leave—returned again:—he had—then a new petition, for then I took a more formal leave of him, expressing my good wishes for his welfare, in a sort of way that implied I expected never to see him again—he would fain have taken a more tender leave of me,—but I repulsed him with great surprise & displeasure. I did not, however, as he was so terribly sorrowful, refuse him my hand, which he had made sundry vain attempts to take in the course of our conversation; when I withdrew it, as I did presently, I rang the bell, to prevent him again returning from the door.

Though I was really sorry for the unfortunate & misplaced attachment which this young man professes for me, yet I could almost have jumped for joy when he was gone, to think that the affair was thus finally over.

Indeed I think it hardly possible for a woman to be in a more irksome situation, than when rejecting an honest man who is all humility, respect & submission, & who throws himself & his fortune at her feet.

The next day—a day the remembrance of which will be never erased from my memory—my father first spoke to me in favor of Mr. Barlow! & desired me not to be peremptory in the answer I was going to write.

I scarce made any answer—I was terrified to death—I felt the utter impossibility of resisting not merely my father's persuasion, but even his advice.—I felt, too, that I had no argumentative objections to make to Mr. Barlow, his character—disposition—situation—I knew nothing against—but O!—I felt he was no companion for my heart!—I wept like an infant—eat nothing—seemed as if already married—& passed the whole day in more misery than, merely on my own account, I ever did before in my life,—except upon the loss of my own beloved mother—& ever revered & most dear grandmother!

After supper, I went into the study, while my dear father was alone, to wish him good night, which I did as cheerfully as I could, though pretty evidently in dreadful uneasiness. When I had got to the door, he called me back, & asked me concerning a new mourning gown I had bought for the mourning of Queen Caroline<sup>6</sup>—he desired to know what it would come to, & as our allowance for clothes is not sumptuous, said he would assist Sukey & me, which he accordingly did, & affectionately embraced me, saying "I wish I could do more for thee, Fanny!" "O sir!" cried I—"I wish for nothing!—only let me live with you!"—"My life!" cried he, kissing me kindly, "Thee shalt live with me for ever, if thee wilt! Thou canst not think I meant to get rid of thee?"

"I could not, sir! I could not!" cried I, "I could not outlive such a thought—" I saw his dear eyes full of tears! a mark of his tenderness which I shall never forget!

"God knows"—continued he—"I wish not to part with my girls!—they are my greatest comfort!—only—do not be too hasty!"

6. A period of general mourning had been ordered after the death of George III's sister Caroline, the queen of Denmark.

Thus relieved, restored to future hopes, I went to bed as light, happy & thankful as if escaped from destruction.<sup>7</sup>

["DOWN WITH HER, BURNEY!"]

Streatham, September 15, 1778<sup>s</sup>

I was then looking over the Life of Cowley, which he<sup>9</sup> had himself given me to read, at the same time that he gave to Mrs. Thrale that of Waller.—They are now printed, though they will not be published for some time. But he bid me put it away.—"Do," cried he, "put away that now, & prattle with us;—I can't make this little Burney prattle,—8c I am sure she prattles well.—but I shall teach her another lesson than to sit thus silent, before I have done with her."

"To talk," cried I, "is the only lesson I shall be backward to learn from you,

Mrs. T. Tomorrow, sir, Mrs. Montagu<sup>1</sup> dines here! 8c then you will have talk enough.

Dr. Johnson began to seesaw, with a countenance strongly expressive of inward fun,—8c, after enjoying it some time in silence, he suddenly, & with great animation, turned to me, 8c cried "Down with her, Burney!—down with her!—spare her not! attack her, fight her, 8c down with her at once!—You are a rising wit,—she is at the top,—8c when I was beginning the world, & was nothing 8c nobody, the joy of my life was to fire at all the established wits!—& then, every body loved to hallow<sup>2</sup> me on;—but there is no game now, 8c now, every body would be glad to see me conquered: but then, when I was new,—to vanquish the great ones was all the delight of my poor little dear soul!—So at her, Burney!—at her, 8c down with her!"

O how we all hollowed!<sup>3</sup> By the way, I must tell you that Mrs. Montagu is in very great estimation here, even with Dr. Johnson himself, when others do not praise her improperly: Mrs. Thrale ranks her as the first of women, in the literary way.

I should have told you, that Miss Gregory, daughter of the Gregory who wrote the letters, or Legacy of advice,<sup>4</sup> lives with Mrs. Montagu, 8c was invited to accompany her.

"Mark, now," said Dr. Johnson, "if I contradict her tomorrow; I am determined, let her say what she will, that I will not contradict her."

Mrs. T. Why, to be sure, Sir, you did put her a little out of countenance last time she came,—yet you were neither rough, nor cruel, nor ill-natured,—but still, when a lady changes color, we imagine her feelings are not quite composed.

Dr. J. Why, madam, I won't answer that I shan't contradict her again, if she

8. Evelina was published in January 1778 and enthusiastically received. After her authorship became known, Burney was invited to Streatham Park, the country house of Hector and Hester Lynch Thrale. Johnson spent much of his time there and was then writing his Lives of the Poets. He and Hester Thrale became fond of Burney.

provokes me as she did then; but a less provocation I will withstand. I believe I am not high in her good graces already, & I begin (added he, laughing heartily) to tremble for my admission into her new house! I doubt I shall never see the inside of it!

Mrs. Montagu is building a most superb house.

Mrs. T. O, I warrant you! she fears you, indeed, but that, you know, is nothing uncommon: & dearly I love to hear your disquisitions,—for certainly she is the first woman, for literary knowledge, in England,—& if in England I hope I may say in the world!

Dr. J. I believe you may, Madam. She diffuses more knowledge in her conversation than any woman I know,—or, indeed, almost any man.

Mrs. T. I declare I know no man equal to her, take away yourself & Burke, for that art.—And you, who love magnificence, won't quarrel with her, as everybody else does, for her love of finery.

Dr. J. No, I shall not quarrel with her upon that topic, (then, looking earnestly at me) "Nay," he added, "it's very handsome."

"What, sir?" cried I, amazed.

"Why your cap:—I have looked at it some time, & I like it much, it has not that vile bandeau<sup>5</sup> across it, which I have so often cursed."

Did you ever hear any thing so strange? Nothing escapes him. My Daddy Crisp<sup>6</sup> is not more minute in his attentions: nay, I think he is even less so.

Mrs. T. Well, sir, that bandeau you quarreled with was worn by every woman at court the last Birth Day,<sup>7</sup>—& I observed that all the men found fault with it.

Dr. J. The truth is,—women,—take them in general,—have no idea of grace!—Fashion is all they think of;—I don't mean Mrs. Thrale & Miss Burney, when I talk of women!—they are goddesses!—& therefore I except them.

Mrs. T. Lady Ladd never wore the bandeau, & said she never would, because it is unbecoming.

Dr. J. (laughing) Did not she? then is Lady Ladd a charming woman, & I have yet hopes of entering into engagements with her!

Mrs. T. Well, as to that, I can't say,—but, to be sure, the only similitude I have yet discovered in you, is in size: there you agree mighty well.

Dr. J. Why if any body could have worn the bandeau, it must have been Lady Ladd, for there is enough of her to carry it off; but you are too little for any thing ridiculous; that which seems nothing upon a Patagonian,<sup>8</sup> will become very conspicuous upon a Lilliputian; & of you there is so little in all, that one single absurdity would swallow up half of you.

Some time after,—when we had all been a few minutes wholly silent, he turned to me, & said "Come, Burney,—shall you & I study our parts against<sup>9</sup> Mrs. Montagu comes?"

How would you be entertained, my dear Susy, if I could give you the manner, as well as matter, of the conversation of this greatest of men.

[A YOUNG AND AGREEABLE INFIDEL]

Bath, June 1780

Miss W is young and pleasing in her appearance, not pretty but agreeable in her face, and soft, gentle, and well-bred in her manners. Our conversation, for some time, was upon the common Bath topics; but when Mrs. Lambart left us—called to receive more company—we went insensibly into graver matters.

As I soon found, by the looks and expressions of this young lady, that she was of a peculiar cast, I left all choice of subjects to herself, determined quietly to follow as she led; and very soon, and I am sure I know not how, we had for topics the follies and vices of mankind, and, indeed, she spared not for lashing them. The women she rather excused than defended, laying to the door of the men their faults and imperfections; but the men, she said, were all bad—all, in one word, and without exception, sensualists!

I stared much at a severity of speech for which her softness of manner had so ill-prepared me; and she, perceiving my surprise, said,

"I am sure I ought to apologize for speaking my opinion to you—you, who have so just and so uncommon a knowledge of human nature. I have long wished ardently to have the honor of conversing with you; but your party has, altogether, been regarded as so formidable, that I have not had courage to approach it."

I made—as what could I do else?—disqualifying speeches, and she then led to discoursing of happiness and misery: the latter she held to be the invariable lot of us all; and "one word," she added, "we have in our language, and in all others, for which there is never any essential necessity, and that is—pleasure!" And her eyes filled with tears as she spoke.

"How you amaze me!" cried I; "I have met with misanthropes before, but never with so complete a one; and I can hardly think I hear right when I see how young you are!"

She then, in rather indirect terms, gave me to understand that she was miserable at home, and in very direct terms, that she was wretched abroad; and openly said, that to affliction she was born, and in affliction she must die, for that the world was so vilely formed as to render happiness impossible for its inhabitants.

There was something in this freedom of repining that I could by no means approve, and, as I found by all her manner that she had a disposition to even respect whatever I said, I now grew very serious, and frankly told her that I could not think it consistent with either truth or religion to cherish such notions.

"One thing," answered she, "there is, which I believe might make me happy, but for that I have no inclination: it is an amorous disposition; but that I do not possess. I can make myself no happiness by intrigue."

"I hope not, indeed!" cried I, almost confounded by her extraordinary notions and speeches; "but, surely, there are worthier objects of happiness attainable!"

"No, I believe there are not, and the reason the men are happier than us, is because they are more sensual!"

"I would not think such thoughts," cried I, clasping my hands with an involuntary vehemence,—"for worlds!"

The Misses C— then interrupted us, and seated themselves next to us; but Miss W— paid them little attention at first, and soon after none at all; but, in a low voice, continued her discourse with me, recurring to the same subject of happiness and misery, upon which, after again asserting the folly of ever hoping for the former, she made this speech:

"There may be, indeed, one moment of happiness, which must be the finding one worthy of exciting a passion which one should dare own to himself.

That would, indeed, be a moment worth living for! but that can never happen—I am sure not to me—the men are so low, so vicious, so worthless! No, there is not one such to be found!"

s s

"Well, you are a most extraordinary character, indeed; I must confess I have seen nothing like you!"

"I hope, however, I shall find something like myself, and, like the magnet rolling in the dust, attract some metal as I go."

"That you may attract what you please, is of all things the most likely; but if you wait to be happy for a friend resembling yourself, I shall no longer wonder at your despondency."

"Oh!" cried she, raising her eyes in ecstasy, "could I find such a one!—male or female—for sex would be indifferent to me. With such a one I would go to live directly."

I half laughed, but was perplexed in my own mind whether to be sad or merry at such a speech.

"But then," she continued, "after making, should I lose such a friend, I would not survive."

"Not survive?" repeated I, "what can you mean?"

She looked down, but said nothing.

"Surely you cannot mean," said I, very gravely indeed, "to put a violent end to your life."

"I should not," said she, again looking up, "hesitate a moment."

I was quite thunderstruck, and for some time could not say a word; but when I did speak, it was in a style of exhortation so serious and earnest, I am ashamed to write it to you, lest you should think it too much.

She gave me an attention that was even respectful, but when I urged her to tell me by what right she thought herself entitled to rush unlicensed on eternity, she said, "By the right of believing I shall be extinct." I really felt horror-struck.

"Where, for heaven's sake," I cried, "where have you picked up such dreadful reasoning?"

"In Hume," said she; "I have read his Essays' repeatedly."

"I am sorry to find they have power to do so much mischief; you should not have read them, at least till a man equal to Hume in abilities had answered him. Have you read any more infidel writers?"

"Yes, Bolingbroke,<sup>2</sup> the divinest of all writers."

"And do you read nothing upon the right side?"

"Yes, the Bible, till I was sick to death of it, every Sunday evening to my mother."

"Have you read Beattie* on the Immutability of Truth?"

"No."

"Give me leave then to recommend it to you. After Hume's Essays you ought to read it. And even for lighter reading, if you were to look at Mason's 'Elegy on Lady Coventry,'<sup>4</sup> it might be of no disservice to you."

This was the chief of our conversation, which indeed made an impression upon me I shall not easily get rid of. A young and agreeable infidel is even a shocking sight, and with her romantic, flighty, and unguarded turn of mind, what could happen to her that could give surprise?

Poor misguided girl!<sup>5</sup>

[ENCOUNTERING THE KING]

Kew' Palace, Monday February 2, 1789

What an adventure had I this morning! one that has occasioned me the severest personal terror I ever experienced in my life.

Sir Lucas Pepys still persisting that exercise and air were absolutely necessary to save me from illness, I have continued my walks, varying my gardens from Richmond to Kew, according to the accounts I received of the movements of the king. For this I had her majesty's permission, on the representation of Sir Lucas.

This morning, when I received my intelligence of the king from Dr. John Willis,<sup>6</sup> I begged to know where I might walk in safety? "In Kew gardens," he said, "as the king would be in Richmond."

"Should any unfortunate circumstance," I cried, "at any time, occasion my being seen by his majesty, do not mention my name, but let me run off without call or notice."

This he promised. Everybody, indeed, is ordered to keep out of sight.

Taking, therefore, the time I had most at command, I strolled into the gardens. I had proceeded, in my quick way, nearly half the round, when I suddenly perceived, through some trees, two or three figures. Relying on the instructions of Dr. John, I concluded them to be workmen and gardeners; yet tried to look sharp, and in so doing, as they were less shaded, I thought I saw the person of his majesty!

Alarmed past all possible expression, I waited not to know more, but turning back, ran off with all my might. But what was my terror to hear myself pursued!—to hear the voice of the king himself loudly and hoarsely calling after me, "Miss Burney! Miss Burney!"

I protest I was ready to die. I knew not in what state he might be at the time; I only knew the orders to keep out of his way were universal; that the queen would highly disapprove any unauthorized meeting, and that the very action of my running away might deeply, in his present irritable state, offend him. Nevertheless, on I ran, too terrified to stop, and in search of some short passage, for the garden is full of little labyrinths, by which I might escape.

The steps still pursued me, and still the poor hoarse and altered voice rang in my ears:—more and more footsteps resounded frightfully behind me,—the attendants all running, to catch their eager master, and the voices of the two Doctor Willises loudly exhorting him not to heat himself so unmercifully.

4. Burney quotes eight lines on immortality from William Mason's elegy "On the Death of a Lady" (1760).

5. A fictional version of the "young infidel" plays a major role in Burney's last novel, The Wanderer (1814).

6. In 1788, two years after Burney joined the court, George III began to have fits of delirium or madness (today diagnosed as resulting from porphyria, a hereditary disease). He was kept in isolation at Kew, under the control of two physicians, Francis and John Willis.

Heavens, how I ran! I do not think I should have felt the hot lava from Vesuvius—at least not the hot cinders—had I so run during its eruption. My feet were not sensible that they even touched the ground.

Soon after, I heard other voices, shriller, though less nervous, call out "Stop! stop! stop!"

I could by no means consent; I knew not what was purposed, but I recollected fully my agreement with Dr. John that very morning, that I should decamp if surprised, and not be named.

My own fears and repugnance, also, after a flight and disobedience like this, were doubled in the thought of not escaping; I knew not to what I might be exposed, should the malady be then high, and take the turn of resentment. Still, therefore, on I flew; and such was my speed, so almost incredible to relate or recollect, that I fairly believe no one of the whole party could have overtaken me, if these words, from one of the attendants, had not reached me: "Doctor Willis begs you to stop!"

"I cannot! I cannot!" I answered, still flying on, when he called out "You must, ma'am; it hurts the king to run."

Then, indeed, I stopped—in a state of fear really amounting to agony. I turned round, I saw the two doctors had got the king between them, and three attendants of Dr. Willis's were hovering about. They all slackened their pace, as they saw me stand still; but such was the excess of my alarm, that I was wholly insensible to the effects of a race which, at any other time, would have required an hour's recruit.<sup>7</sup>

As they approached, some little presence of mind happily came to my command; it occurred to me that, to appease the wrath of my flight, I must now show some confidence. I therefore faced them as undauntedly as I was able, only charging the nearest of the attendants to stand by my side.

When they were within a few yards of me, the king called out, "Why did you run away?"

Shocked at a question impossible to answer, yet a little assured by the mild tone of his voice, I instantly forced myself forward, to meet him, though the internal sensation, which satisfied me this was a step the most proper to appease his suspicions and displeasure, was so violently combated by the tremor of my nerves, that I fairly think I may reckon it the greatest effort of personal courage I have ever made.

The effort answered: I looked up, and met all his wonted benignity of countenance, though something still of wildness in his eyes. Think, however, of my surprise, to feel him put both his hands round my two shoulders, and then kiss my cheek!

I wonder I did not really sink, so exquisite was my affright when I saw him spread out his arms! Involuntarily, I concluded he meant to crush me; but the Willises, who have never seen him till this fatal illness, not knowing how very extraordinary an action this was from him, simply smiled and looked pleased, supposing, perhaps, it was his customary salutation!

I believe, however, it was but the joy of a heart unbridled, now, by the forms and proprieties of established custom and sober reason. To see any of his household thus by accident, seemed such a near approach to liberty and recovery, that who can wonder it should serve rather to elate<sup>8</sup> than lessen what yet remains of his disorder!

He now spoke in such terms of his pleasure in seeing me, that I soon lost the whole of my terror; astonishment to find him so nearly well, and gratification to see him so pleased, removed every uneasy feeling, and the joy that succeeded, in my conviction of his recovery, made me ready to throw myself at his feet to express it.

What a conversation followed! When he saw me fearless, he grew more and more alive, and made me walk close by his side, away from the attendants, and even the Willises themselves, who, to indulge him, retreated. I own myself not completely composed, but alarm I could entertain no more.

Everything that came uppermost in his mind he mentioned; he seemed to have just such remains of his flightiness as heated his imagination without deranging his reason, and robbed him of all control over his speech, though nearly in his perfect state of mind as to his opinions.

What did he not say!—He opened his whole heart to me,—expounded all his sentiments, and acquainted me with all his intentions.

ft > *

He next talked to me a great deal of my dear father, and made a thousand inquiries concerning his "History of Music." This brought him to his favorite theme, Handel;<sup>9</sup> and he told me innumerable anecdotes of him, and particularly that celebrated tale of Handel's saying of himself, when a boy, "While that boy lives, my music will never want a protector." And this, he said, I might relate to my father. Then he ran over most of his oratorios, attempting to sing the subjects of several airs and choruses, but so dreadfully hoarse that the sound was terrible.

Dr. Willis, quite alarmed at this exertion, feared he would do himself harm, and again proposed a separation. "No! no! no!" he exclaimed, "not yet; I have something I must just mention first."

Dr. Willis, delighted to comply, even when uneasy at compliance, again gave way. The good king then greatly affected me. He began upon my revered old friend, Mrs. Delany;<sup>1</sup> and he spoke of her with such warmth—such kindness! "She was my friend!" he cried, "and I loved her as a friend! I have made a memorandum when I lost her—I will show it you."

He pulled out a pocketbook, and rummaged some time, but to no purpose. The tears stood in his eyes—he wiped them, and Dr. Willis again became very anxious. "Come, sir," he cried, "now do you come in and let the lady go on her walk,—come, now you have talked a long while,—so we'll go in,—if your majesty pleases."

"No, no!" he cried, "I want to ask her a few questions;—I have lived so long out of the world, I know nothing!"

This touched me to the heart.

ft

What a scene! how variously was I affected by it! but, upon the whole, how inexpressibly thankful to see him so nearly himself—so little removed from recovery!

[A MASTECTOMY]

Paris, March 22, 1812<sup>2</sup>

Separated as I have now so long—long been from my dearest father—brothers—sisters—nieces, & native friends, I would spare, at least, their kind hearts any grief for me but what they must inevitably feel in reflecting upon the sorrow of such an absence to one so tenderly attached to all her first and forever so dear & regretted ties—nevertheless, if they should hear that I have been dangerously ill from any hand but my own, they might have doubts of my perfect recovery which my own alone can obviate. And how can I hope they will escape hearing what has reached Seville to the south, and Constantinople to the east? from both I have had messages—yet nothing could urge me to this communication till I heard that M. de Boinville had written it to his wife, without any precaution, because in ignorance of my plan of silence.<sup>3</sup> Still I must hope it may never travel to my dearest father—But to you, my beloved Esther, who, living more in the world, will surely hear it ere long, to you I will write the whole history, certain that, from the moment you know any evil has befallen me your kind kind heart will be constantly anxious to learn its extent, & its circumstances, as well as its termination.

About August, in the year 1810, I began to be annoyed by a small pain in my breast, which went on augmenting from week to week, yet, being rather heavy than acute, without causing me any uneasiness with respect to the consequences: Alas, "what was the ignorance?" The most sympathizing of partners, however, was more disturbed: not a start, not a wry face, not a movement that indicated pain was unobserved, & he early conceived apprehensions to which I was a stranger. He pressed me to see some surgeon; I revolted from the idea, & hoped, by care & warmth, to make all succor unnecessary. Thus passed some months, during which Madame de Maisonneuve, my particularly intimate friend, joined with M. d'Arblay to press me to consent to an examination. I thought their fears groundless, and could not make so great a conquest over my repugnance. I relate this false confidence, now, as a warning to my dear Esther—my sisters & nieces, should any similar sensations excite similar alarm. M. d'A. now revealed his uneasiness to another of our kind friends, Mme. de Tracy, who wrote to me a long & eloquent letter upon the subject, that began to awaken very unpleasant surmises; & a conference with her ensued, in which her urgency & representations, aided by her long experience of disease, & most miserable existence by art, subdued me, and, most painfully & reluctantly, I ceased to object, & M. d'A. summoned a physician—M. Bourdois? Maria will cry;—No, my dear Maria, I would not give your beau frere<sup>4</sup> that trouble; not him, but Dr. Jouart, the physician of Miss Potts. Thinking but slightly of my statement, he gave me some directions that produced no fruit—on the contrary, I grew worse, & M. d'A. now would take no denial to my consulting M. Dubois, who had already attended & cured me in an abscess of which Maria, my dearest Esther, can give you the history. M. Dubois, the most celebrated surgeon of France, was then appointed accoucheur to the empress, & already lodged in the Tuilleries,<sup>5</sup> & in constant attendance: but nothing could slacken the ardor of M. d'A. to obtain the first advice. Fortunately for his kind wishes, M. Dubois had retained a partial regard for me from the time of his former attendance, & when applied to through a third person, he took the first moment of liberty, granted by a promenade taken by the empress, to come to me. It was now I began to perceive my real danger. M. Dubois gave me a prescription to be pursued for a month, during which time he could not undertake to see me again, & pronounced nothing—but uttered so many charges to me to be tranquil, & to suffer no uneasiness, that I could not but suspect there was room for terrible inquietude. My alarm was increased by the nonappearance of M. d'A. after his departure. They had remained together some time in the book room, & M. d'A. did not return—till, unable to bear the suspense, I begged him to come back. He, also, sought then to tranquilize me—but in words only; his looks were shocking! his features, his whole face displayed the bitterest woe. I had not, therefore, much difficulty in telling myself what he endeavored not to tell me—that a small operation would be necessary to avert evil consequences!—Ah, my dearest Esther, for this I felt no courage—my dread & repugnance, from a thousand reasons besides the pain, almost shook all my faculties, & for some time, I was rather confounded & stupified than affrighted.—Direful, however, was the effect of this interview; the pains became quicker & more violent, & the hardness of the spot affected increased. I took, but vainly, my prescription, & every symptom grew more serious.

A physician was now called in, Dr. Moreau, to hear if he could suggest any new means: but Dr. Larrey<sup>6</sup> had left him no resources untried. A formal consultation now was held, of Larrey, Ribe, & Moreau—& in fine, I was formally condemned to an operation by all three. I was as much astonished as disappointed—for the poor breast was no where discolored, & not much larger than its healthy neighbor. Yet I felt the evil to be deep, so deep, that I often thought if it could not be dissolved, it could only with life be extirpated. I called up, however, all the reason I possessed, or could assume, & told them—that if they saw no other alternative, I would not resist their opinion & experience:—the good Dr. Larrey, who, during his long attendance had conceived for me the warmest friendship, had now tears in his eyes; from my dread he had expected resistance.

ft ft «

All hope of escaping this evil being now at an end, I could only console or employ my mind in considering how to render it less dreadful to M. d'A. M. Dubois had pronounced "il faut s'attendre a souffrir. Je ne veux pas vous trompez—Vous souffrirez—vous souffrirez beaucoup!"<sup>7</sup> M. Ribe had charged me to cry! to withhold or restrain myself might have seriously bad consequences, he said. M. Moreau, in echoing this injunction, inquired whether I had cried or screamed at the birth of Alexander—Alas, I told him, it had not been possible to do otherwise; Oh then, he answered, there is no fear!—What terrible inferences were here to be drawn! I desired, therefore, that M. d'A. might be kept in ignorance of the day till the operation should be over. To this they agreed, except M. Larrey, with high approbation; M. Larrey looked dissentient, but was silent. M. Dubois protested he would not undertake to act, after what he had seen of the agitated spirits of M. d'A. if he were present; nor would he suffer me to know the time myself over night. I obtained with difficulty a promise of 4 hours warning, which were essential to me for sundry regulations.

From this time, I assumed the best spirits in my power, to meet the coming blow;—& support my too sympathizing partner.

Sundry necessary works & orders filled up my time entirely till one o'clock. When all was ready but Dr. Moreau then arrived, with news that M. Dubois could not attend till three. Dr. Aumont went away—& the coast was clear. This, indeed, was a dreadful interval. I had no longer any thing to do—I had only to think—TWO HOURS thus spent seemed never-ending. I would fain have written to my dearest father—to you, my Esther—to Charlotte, James, Charles—Amelia Lock—but my arm prohibited me. I strolled to the salon—I saw it fitted with preparations, & I recoiled—But I soon returned; to what effect disguise from myself what I must so soon know?—~~yet~~ the sight of the immense quantity of bandages, compresses, sponges, lint made me a little sick.—I walked backwards & forwards till I quieted all emotion, & became, by degrees, nearly stupid—torpid, without sentiment or consciousness;—& thus I remained till the clock struck three. A sudden spirit of exertion then returned—I defied my poor arm, no longer worth sparing, & took my long banished pen to write a few words to M. d'A.—& a few more for Alex, in case of a fatal result. These short billets I could only deposit safely, when the cabriolets<sup>8</sup>—one—two—three—four—succeeded rapidly to each other in stopping at the door. Dr. Moreau instantly entered my room, to see if I were alive. He gave me a wine cordial, & went to the salon. I rang for my maid & nurses—but before I could speak to them, my room, without previous message, was entered by 7 men in black, Dr. Larrey, M. Dubois, Dr. Moreau, Dr. Aumont, Dr. Ribe, & a pupil of Dr. Larrey, & another of M. Dubois. I was now awakened from my stupor—& by a sort of indignation—Why so many? & without leave?—But I could not utter a syllable. M. Dubois acted as commander in chief. Dr. Larrey kept out of sight; M. Dubois ordered a bedstead into the middle of the room. Astonished, I turned to Dr. Larrey, who had promised that an armchair would suffice; but he hung his head, & would not look at me. Two old mattresses M. Dubois then demanded, & an old sheet. I now began to tremble violently, more with distaste & horror of the preparations even than of the pain. These arranged to his liking, he desired me to mount the bedstead. I stood suspended, for a moment, whether I should not abruptly escape—I looked at the door, the windows—I felt desperate—but it was only for a moment, my reason then took the command, & my fears & feelings struggled vainly against it. I called to my maid—she was crying, & the two nurses stood, transfixed, at the door. "Let those women all go!" cried M. Dubois. This order recovered me my voice—"No," I cried, "let them stay! qu'elles restent!" This occasioned a little dispute, that re-animated me. The maid, however, & one of the nurses ran off—I charged the other to approach, & she obeyed. M. Dubois now tried to issue his commands en militaire,<sup>9</sup> but

8. Carriages.

9. In military fashion. Most of the attending physicians had been army surgeons.

I resisted all that were resistible—I was compelled, however, to submit to taking off my long robe de chambre,<sup>1</sup> which I had meant to retain—Ah, then, how did I think of my sisters!—not one, at so dreadful an instant, at hand, to protect—adjust—guard me—I regretted that I had refused Mme de Maison-neuve—Mme Chastel—no one upon whom I could rely—my departed angel!<sup>2</sup>—how did I think of her!—how did I long—long for my Esther—my Charlotte!—My distress was, I suppose, apparent, though not my wishes, for M. Dubois himself now softened, & spoke soothingly. "Can you," I cried, "feel for an operation that, to you, must seem so trivial?"—"Trivial?" he repeated—taking up a bit of paper, which he tore, unconsciously, into a million of pieces, "oui—c'est peu de chose—mats"<sup>3</sup> he stammered, & could not go on. No one else attempted to speak, but I was softened myself, when I saw even M. Dubois grow agitated, while Dr. Larrey kept always aloof, yet a glance showed me he was pale as ashes. I knew not, positively, then, the immediate danger, but everything convinced me danger was hovering about me, & that this experiment could alone save me from its jaws. I mounted, therefore, unbidden, the bedstead—& M. Dubois placed me upon the mattress, & spread a cambric handkerchief upon my face. It was transparent, however, & I saw, through it, that the bedstead was instantly surrounded by the 7 men & my nurse. I refused to be held; but when, bright through the cambric, I saw the glitter of polished steel—I closed my eyes. I would not trust to convulsive fear the sight of the terrible incision. A silence the most profound ensued, which lasted for some minutes, during which, I imagine, they took their orders by signs, & made their examination—Oh what a horrible suspension!—I did not breathe—& M. Dubois tried vainly to find any pulse. This pause, at length, was broken by Dr. Larrey, who, in a voice of solemn melancholy, said "Qui me tiendra ce sein?"<sup>4</sup>

No one answered; at least not verbally; but this aroused me from my passively submissive state, for I feared they imagined the whole breast infected—feared it too justly—for, again through the cambric, I saw the hand of M. Dubois held up, while his forefinger first described a straight line from top to bottom of the breast, secondly a cross, & thirdly a circle; intimating that the WHOLE was to be taken off. Excited by this idea, I started up, threw off my veil, & in answer to the demand "Oui me tiendra ce sein?" cried "C'est moi, monsieur!"<sup>5</sup> & I held my hand under it, & explained the nature of my sufferings, which all sprang from one point, though they darted into every part. I was heard attentively, but in utter silence, & M. Dubois then re-placed me as before, & as before, spread my veil over my face. How vain, alas, my representation! immediately again I saw the fatal finger describe the cross—& the circle. Hopeless, then, desperate, & self-given up, I closed once more my eyes, relinquishing all watching, all resistance, all interference, & sadly resolute to be wholly resigned.

My dearest Esther, & all my dears to whom she communicates this doleful ditty, will rejoice to hear that this resolution once taken, was firmly adhered to, in defiance of a terror that surpasses all description, & the most torturing pain. Yet—when the dreadful steel was plunged into the breast—cutting through veins—arteries—flesh—nerves—I needed no injunctions not to restrain my cries. I began a scream that lasted unintermittingly during the whole time of the incision—& I almost marvel that it rings not in my ears still! so excruciating was the agony. When the wound was made, & the instrument was withdrawn, the pain seemed undiminished, for the air that suddenly rushed into those delicate parts felt like a mass of minute but sharp & forked poniards,<sup>6</sup> that were tearing the edges of the wound—but when again I felt the instrument—describing a curve—cutting against the grain, if I may so say, while the flesh resisted in a manner so forcible as to oppose & tire the hand of the operator, who was forced to change from the right to the left—then, indeed, I thought I must have expired. I attempted no more to open my eyes,—they felt as if hermetically shut, & so firmly closed, that the eyelids seemed indented into the cheeks. The instrument this second time withdrawn, I concluded the operation over. Oh no! presently the terrible cutting was renewed—& worse than ever, to separate the bottom, the foundation of this dreadful gland from the parts to which it adhered. Again all description would be baffled—yet again all was not over.—Dr. Larrey rested but his own hand, &—Oh heaven!—I then felt the knife racliding<sup>7</sup> against the breast bone—scraping it!—This performed, while I yet remained in utterly speechless torture, I heard the voice of Mr. Larrey (all others guarded a dead silence) in a tone nearly tragic, desire every one present to pronounce if any thing more remained to be done. The general voice was Yes—but the finger of Mr. Dubois—which I literally felt elevated over the wound, though I saw nothing, & though he touched nothing, so indescribably sensitive was the spot—pointed to some further requisition<sup>8</sup>—& again began the scraping!—and, after this, Dr. Moreau thought he discerned a peccant atom—and still, & still, M. Dubois demanded atom after atom. My dearest Esther, not for days, not for weeks, but for months I could not speak of this terrible business without nearly again going through it! I could not think of it with impunity! I was sick, I was disordered by a single question—even now, 9 months after it is over, I have a headache from going on with the account! & this miserable account, which I began 3 months ago, at least, I dare not revise, nor read, the recollection is still so painful.

To conclude, the evil was so profound, the case so delicate, & the precautions necessary for preventing a return so numerous, that the operation, including the treatment & the dressing, lasted 20 minutes! a time, for sufferings so acute, that was hardly supportable. However, I bore it with all the courage I could exert, & never moved, nor stopped them, nor resisted, nor remonstrated, nor spoke—except once or twice, during the dressings, to say "Ah Messieurs! que je vous plains!"<sup>9</sup> for indeed I was sensible to the feeling concern with which they all saw what I endured, though my speech was principally—very principally meant for Dr. Larrey. Except this, I uttered not a syllable, save, when so often they recommenced, calling out "Avertissez moi,<sup>1</sup> Messieurs! avertissez moi!" Twice, I believe, I fainted; at least, I have two total chasms in my memory of this transaction, that impede my tying together what passed. When all was done, & they lifted me up that I might be put to bed, my strength was so totally annihilated, that I was obliged to be carried, & could not even sustain my hands & arms, which hung as if I had been lifeless; while my face, as the nurse has told me, was utterly colorless. This removal made me open my eyes—and I then saw my good Dr. Larrey, pale nearly as myself, his face streaked with blood, & its expression depicting grief, apprehension, & almost horror.

When I was in bed, my poor M. d'Arblay—who ought to write you himself his own history of this morning—was called to me—and afterwards our Alex.—

[M. D'ARBLAY'S POSTSCRIPT]

No! No my dearest & ever more dear friends, I shall not make a fruitless attempt. No language could convey what I felt in the deadly course of these seven hours. Nevertheless, every one of you, my dearest dearest friends, can guess, must even know it. Alexander had no less feeling, but showed more fortitude. He, perhaps, will be more able to describe to you, nearly at least, the torturing state of my poor heart & soul. Besides, I must own, to you, that these details which were, till just now, quite unknown to me, have almost killed me, & I am only able to thank God that this more than half angel has had the sublime courage to deny herself the comfort I might have offered her, to spare me, not the sharing of her excruciating pains, that was impossible, but the witnessing so terrific a scene, & perhaps the remorse to have rendered it more tragic. For I don't flatter myself I could have got through it—I must confess it.

Thank heaven! She is now surprisingly well, & in good spirits, & we hope to have many many still happy days. May that of peace soon arrive, and enable me to embrace better than with my pen my beloved & ever ever more dear friends of the town & country. Amen. Amen!<sup>2</sup>

2. The wound healed without infection. Burney returned to England later in 1812 and lived for twenty-eight years.

No idea resonated more strongly in the minds of Britons in the eighteenth century than liberty. Writers explained its political significance in many, at times contradictory ways. It was seen by some as the natural right of every human being, and by others as a uniquely British birthright. Its origins were hotly debated: as their model of liberty, some took the ancient Roman Republic, others the ancient, "Gothic" constitution of pre-Norman England. To other minds, it was a distinctly modern product: either of the volatile, bloody period of the English civil wars and Commonwealth (when Milton's defense of liberty, "Areopagitica," appeared), or of the remarkably bloodless Glorious Revolution of 1688, which established the stability some felt was needed for true liberty to be enjoyed. Some thought liberty could prosper only in a society where power lay in the hands of independent landowners, while others felt it thrived best on the fluidity of commerce, markets, and credit. In different contexts throughout the eighteenth century, ideologues across the political spectrum, both Tories and Whigs, appealed to some understanding of British liberty as a fundamental, guiding principle.

But the concept of liberty applied far beyond the spheres of economics and politics. It became the basis for a new social ethos: as the third Earl of Shaftesbury remarks in the selection printed here, "all politeness is owing to liberty." And English literature itself derived its character from the elaboration of the concept. Most practically, the eighteenth century witnessed a growing respect for the freedom of the press and the end of prepublication censorship. As an abstract idea and a piece of political ideology, liberty also absorbed the attention of leading writers: Henry Fielding, William Collins, James Thomson, and Joseph Warton, among many others, wrote idealistic (and in Thomson's case, rather long) poems addressed to it in the 1730s and 1740s. Perhaps most profoundly, a reverence for liberty granted an imaginative, intellectual, and sentimental expansiveness to English literature: frequently contrasted with the French neoclassicists' supposedly slavish regard for the rules of good writing (which was thought to be of a piece with France's royal absolutism), the English love of liberty fostered literary naturalness, truth, and originality. In "The Preface to Shakespeare," Samuel Johnson defends Shakespeare's disregard of the unities of time and place in these terms, declaring that such violations of the rules suit "the comprehensive genius of Shakespeare."

It is, therefore, the most considerable of historical ironies that liberty-loving eighteenth-century Britain engaged as extensively as it did in the slave trade. In the early 1660s, when the events in Behn's Oroonoko are supposed to have taken place, this engagement was gathering momentum. Later, in 1713, the Treaty of Utrecht secured Great Britain the contract (asiento) to monopolize the export of slaves to Spain's American colonies. Bristol and then Liverpool developed into prosperous slave ports, trading manufactured goods to Africa for human cargo, which crossed the Atlantic on ships that returned to England with sugar and money. By the 1780s, when Britain shipped a third of a million slaves to the New World, the national economy depended on this so-called Triangle Trade. Though slavery was not new to Africa, the Middle Passage—the deadly voyage across the Atlantic—made the suffering and degradation it inflicted newly terrible, brutal, and global. The former slave Olaudah Equiano describes his own experience of such a crossing.

The stark contradiction of Britons' love of liberty and their profit from slavery is reflected in English political philosophy and law. John Locke's chapter "Of Slavery" from the Second Treatise of Civil Government sets forth the idea that "the natural liberty of man is to be free from any superior power on earth," but Locke also invested in the slave trade and upheld the notion that slavery was necessary in various writings. And though William Blackstone wrote in his commentaries on English law that "a slave or negro, the moment he lands in England, falls under the protection of the laws," and thus becomes a freeman, he later added another clause: "though the master's right to his service may probably still continue" (1769).

Yet the eighteenth-century language of liberty was not merely hypocritical. It provided terms in which a range of injustices, inequalities, and abridgements of rights could be attacked and thus became a language of world-transforming, even revolutionary importance. It helped stimulate the growth of feminism, as Mary Astell ironically explores its applicability to women, Mary Wortley Montagu laments the "eternal chains" of oppressive matrimony in "Epistle from Mrs. Yonge to Her Husband" (1724), and Mary Wollstonecraft later affirms that both genders deserve "to breathe the sharp invigorating air of freedom" in A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792). It also inspired the British abolitionist movement, which gained particular fervor in the 1780s; a bill abolishing the slave trade finally became law in Britain in 1807. That did not put an end, of course, to illegal trade, let alone to already existing slavery itself. The conflict between boasts of liberty and the enslavement of human beings then passed from Britain to America, where its consequences would be written in blood.

JOHN LOCKE

At Stowe in Buckinghamshire, the greatest of eighteenth-century English landscape gardens, a bust of John Locke appears in a temple with busts of Pope, Newton, Milton, Shakespeare, Queen Elizabeth I, and other "British Worthies." The inscription under his name says that he, "best of all philosophers, understood the powers of the human mind, the nature, end, and bounds of civil government; and with equal sagacity refuted the slavish system of usurped authority over the rights, the consciences, or the reason of mankind." Locke's reputation as the philosopher of political liberty in the eighteenth century is not always this easy to read, nor is it as obviously preeminent as his influence as a philosopher of "the powers of the human mind" (see the selection from the Essay Concerning Human Understanding, p. 2152, for his program for the liberation of mankind's reason). Other Whig writers from Locke's era arguably influenced the developing discourse of liberty as much as or more than his Two Treatises of Government did (published 1690). Indeed, it is not clear the radicalism of the Treatises was always appreciated. Scholars have found they were mostly composed during the years 1679–81, before the Glorious Revolution (1688), not after it: the works represent not an after-the-fact justification of deposing a tyrannical king, James II, but rather a more dangerous meditation on the people's right to depose tyrants during the turbulent years of Charles II's reign. In any case, the inscription at Stowe, executed half a century later in the 1730s to buoy the Whig and Tory opposition to Robert Walpole's putatively corrupt, tyrannical Whig administration, attests to Locke's continuing relevance to defenders of liberty as eighteenth-century politics evolved. A classic articulation of the rights and freedoms of the individual, Locke's second Treatise has come to occupy a preeminent place in political theory.

The degree of Locke's own opposition to slavish systems was far from unambiguous, however. Though he maintains that all men are born free, he himself invested in the Boyal Africa Company (formed 1672) and a group of "Bahamas Adventurers": both enterprises were predicated on slavery. Scholars have also argued that he helped draft

"The Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina" (1669), with his employer Lord Ashley, which granted each freeman "absolute power and authority over his negro slaves." (Ashley would become the first Earl of Shaftesbury, himself the great Whig paragon of liberty.) The selection included here from the second Treatise indicates both Locke's detestation of the condition of slavery and his allowance for its justification: if he can somehow consider slaveholders the "lawful conquerors" of their slaves, who themselves may have committed some base act or other, Locke may defend the slave-owning and slave-trading societies he wished to legitimize. Over Britons, however, he believed that civil government should never be tyrannical, because of their natural rights to liberty and property. Locke's first Treatise (not printed here) attacked the writings of Sir Robert Filmer, who insisted that kings hold a patriarchal authority over their subjects ultimately derived from God's authority over all mankind. The second Treatise describes the origins and ends of legitimate political society, from the state of nature, in which mankind discovers the natural rights to liberty and property, to the institution of civil government, designed solely to protect these rights and allow them best to flourish.

From Two Treatises of Government

An Essay Concerning the True Original, Extent, and End of Civil Government

CHAPTER rv. OF SLAVERY

22. The natural liberty of man is to be free from any superior power on earth, and not to be under the will or legislative authority of man, but to have only the law of nature for his rule. The liberty of man in society is to be under no other legislative power, but that established, by consent, in the commonwealth; nor under the dominion of any will, or restraint of any law, but what that legislative shall enact, according to the trust put in it. Freedom then is not what Sir R. F. tells us, O.A. 55, "A liberty for every one to do what he lists, to live as he pleases, and not to be tied by any laws":<sup>1</sup> but freedom of men under government is to have a standing rule to live by, common to every one of that society, and made by the legislative power erected in it, a liberty to follow my own will in all things, where the rule prescribes not, [and] not to be subject to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary will of another man; as freedom of nature is to be under no other restraint but the law of nature.

23. This freedom from absolute, arbitrary power is so necessary to and closely joined with a man's preservation that he cannot part with it but by what forfeits his preservation and life together. For a man, not having the power of his own life,<sup>2</sup> cannot by compact or his own consent enslave himself to any one, nor put himself under the absolute, arbitrary power of another, to take away his life, when he pleases. Nobody can give more power than he has himself; and he that cannot take away his own life cannot give another power over it. Indeed having, by his fault, forfeited his own life by some act that

1. Sir Robert Filmer (1588-1653), a defender of royal prerogative and the divine right of kings, is Locke's chief opponent in the first Treatise. Locke here refers to page 55 of the 1679 republication of Filmer's Ohsen'ations upon Aristotle's Politics (originally published 1652).

2. In chapter 2, section 6 of the second Treatise, Locke explained that the law of nature, which is essentially the will of God as our reason reveals it to us, dictates that human beings may not commit suicide.

deserves death; he to whom he has forfeited it may (when he has him in his power) delay to take it, and make use of him to his own service, and he does him no injury by it. For whenever he finds the hardship of his slavery outweigh the value of his life, 'tis in his power by resisting the will of his master to draw on himself the death he desires.

24. This is the perfect condition of slavery, which is nothing else but the state of war continued between a lawful conqueror and a captive. For if once compact enter between them<sup>3</sup> and make an agreement for a limited power on the one side, and obedience on the other, the state of war and slavery ceases, as long as the compact endures. For as has been said, no man can by agreement pass over to another that which he hath not in himself, a power over his own life.

I confess we find among the Jews as well as other nations that men did sell themselves; but, 'tis plain this was only to drudgery, not to slavery. For it is evident the person sold was not under an absolute, arbitrary, despotic power. For the master could not have power to kill him at any time whom at a certain time he was obliged to let go free out of his service: and the master of such a servant was so far from having an arbitrary power over his life, that he could not, at pleasure, so much as maim him, but the loss of an eye, or tooth, set him free, Exod. XXI.

CHAPTER IX. OF THE ENDS OF POLITICAL SOCIETY AND GOVERNMENT

123. If man in the state of nature be so free, as has been said; if he be absolute lord of his own person<sup>4</sup> and possessions, equal to the greatest and subject to nobody, why will he part with his freedom? Why will he give up this empire, and subject himself to the dominion and control of any other power? To which 'tis obvious to answer that though in the state of nature he hath such a right, yet the enjoyment of it is very uncertain and constantly exposed to the invasion of others; for all being kings as much as he, every man his equal, and the greater part no strict observers of equity and justice, the enjoyment of the property he has in this state is very unsafe, very insecure. This makes him willing to quit this condition, which however free is full of fears and continual dangers: and 'tis not without reason that he seeks out and is willing to join in society with others who are already united or have a mind to unite for the mutual preservation of their lives, liberties, and estates, which I call by the general name, property.

124. The great and chief end therefore of men's uniting into commonwealths and putting themselves under government is the preservation of their property. To which in the state of nature there are many things wanting.

First, there wants an established, settled, known law, received and allowed by common consent to be the standard of right and wrong, and the common measure to decide all controversies between them. For though the law of nature be plain and intelligible to all rational creatures; yet men being biased by their interest, as well as ignorant for want of study of it, are not apt to allow of it as a law binding to them in the application of it to their particular cases.

125. Secondly, in the state of nature there wants a known and indifferent<sup>5</sup>

3. That is, once their relationship attains the status of a legal agreement or contract.

4. Body, physical being. Locke earlier defines "the state of nature," the "state all men are naturally in," as "a state of perfect freedom to order their actions and dispose of their possessions and persons as they think fit, within the bounds of the law of nature, without asking leave or depending upon the will of any other man" (chapter 2, section 4).

5. Impartial.

judge, with authority to determine all differences according to the established law. For everyone in that state being both judge and executioner of the law of nature, men being partial to themselves, passion and revenge is very apt to carry them too far, and with too much heat in their own cases, as well as negligence and unconcernedness make them too remiss in other men's.

126. Thirdly, in the state of nature there often wants power to back and support the sentence when right, and to give it due execution. They who by any injustice offended will seldom fail where they are able by force to make good their injustice; such resistance many times makes the punishment dangerous and frequently destructive to those who attempt it.

127. Thus mankind, notwithstanding all the privileges of the state of nature, being but in an ill condition while they remain in it, are quickly driven into society. Hence it comes to pass that we seldom find any number of men live any time together in this state. The inconveniencies that they are therein exposed to by the irregular and uncertain exercise of the power every man has of punishing the transgressions of others make them take sanctuary under the established laws of government, and therein seek the preservation of their property. 'Tis this makes them so willingly give up every one his single power of punishing to be exercised by such alone as shall be appointed to it amongst them; and by such rules as the community, or those authorized by them to that purpose, shall agree on. And in this we have the original right and rise of both the legislative and executive power,<sup>6</sup> as well as of the governments and societies themselves.

128. For in the state of nature, to omit the liberty he has of innocent delights, a man has two powers. The first is to do whatsoever he thinks fit for the preservation of himself and others within the permission of the law of nature; by which law common to them all, he and all the rest of mankind are one community, make up one society distinct from all other creatures, and were it not for the corruption and viciousness of degenerate men, there would be no need of any other, no necessity that men should separate from this great and natural community and associate into lesser combinations. The other power a man has in the state of nature is the power to punish the crimes committed against that law. Both these he gives up when he joins in a private, if I may so call it, or particular political society, and incorporates into any commonwealth<sup>7</sup> separate from the rest of mankind.

129. The first power, viz. of doing whatsoever he thought fit for the preservation of himself and the rest of mankind, he gives up to be regulated by laws made by the society, so far forth as the preservation of himself and the rest of that society shall require; which laws of the society in many things confine the liberty he had by the law of nature.

130. Secondly, the power of punishing he wholly gives up, and engages his natural force, which he might before employ in the execution of the law of nature, by his own single authority, as he thought fit, to assist the executive power of the society, as the law thereof shall require. For being now in a new state wherein he is to enjoy many conveniences from the labor, assistance, and society of others in the same community, as well as protection from its whole strength; he is to part also with as much of his natural liberty in providing for himself, as the good, prosperity, and safety of the society shall require; which is not only necessary but just, since the other members of the society do the like.

7. A political unit formed for the common good of its members.

131. But though men when they enter into society give up the equality, liberty, and executive power they had in the state of nature into the hands of the society, to be so far disposed of by the legislative as the good of the society shall require; yet it being only with an intention in everyone, the better to preserve himself, his liberty, and property, (for no rational creature can be supposed to change his condition with an intention to be worse), the power of the society, or legislative constituted by them, can never be supposed to extend farther than the common good; but is' obliged to secure everyone's property by providing against those three defects above-mentioned, that made the state of nature so unsafe and uneasy. And so whoever has the legislative or supreme power of any commonwealth is bound to govern by established standing laws, promulgated and known to the people, and not by extemporary decrees; by indifferent and upright judges, who are to decide controversies by those laws; and to employ the force of the community at home, only in the execution of such laws, or abroad to prevent or redress foreign injuries, and secure the community from inroads and invasion. And all this to be directed to no other end, but the peace, safety, and public good of the people.

MARY ASTELL

Mary Astell challenged many orthodoxies, including the ideas that women should not be educated, that they are intellectually inferior to men, and that they ought to marry at practically any cost (see Some Reflections upon Marriage, p. 2285). Yet she was also a vigorous Tory controversialist who defended the doctrine of the divine right of kings, argued that English subjects owe (at least) "passive obedience" to their monarchs, and denounced toleration of Dissenters. Astell devoted much of her writing to political controversy: she published three substantial political pamphlets in 1704 alone. Her four-hundred-page magnum opus, The Christian Religion as Profess'd by a Daughter of the Church of England (1705), explicitly attacks Locke's Two Treatises of Government; at various places in her work, she criticizes his theological essay The Reasonableness of Christianity (1695); and she even mocks what she sees as the political tendency of his epistemology in his Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1689). Her Tory convictions also color her discussions of gender relations. In Some Reflections upon Marriage, she consistently draws parallels between a wife's duty of obedience to her husband and the obedience that subjects owe their sovereigns: a woman who marries "elects a monarch for life" and "gives him an authority she cannot recall however he misapply it." She devoutly held her belief in obedience, authority, and hierarchy—it was far more than a mere concession to the status quo—and this stance set her against the Whig theorists who supported the rights of subjects to disobey unjust power.

Yet Astell's involvement in contemporary political debate made certain ironies irresistible to her. Her most famous work, the "Preface, in Answer to Some Objections" added to the third edition of Reflections upon Marriage (1706; the word some was dropped from the title) is filled with the language of freedom, tyranny, rights, and slavery. In the Preface, she singles out some of Locke's pronouncements in the chapter "Of Slavery" from the Second Treatise of Government for ironic commentary. "If all men are born free, how is it that all women are born slaves?" she asks. Such questions expose the hypocrisy of male advocates of liberty who refuse to extend it to domestic relationships. And perhaps Astell's ironies do more. While she would never espouse the right to rebel against unjust authority in a marriage or a monarchy, some readers find in the Preface an awareness of domestic tyranny too keen to be piously constrained, and detect in Astell's deftly ironic repetition of the formulaic praises of liberty the seeds of women's liberation. Much of the Preface catalogs strong, sensible women from both the Old and New Testaments to prove that the Bible does not proclaim women's natural intellectual inferiority. In the paragraphs printed here, Astell approaches an outright denunciation of the "arbitrary power" that men exercise in families. Through the very sarcasm with which she accepts the subjection of wives in marriage, she draws close to applying a doctrine of English political liberty to women.

From A Preface, in Answer to Some Objections to Reflections upon Marriage

[T]his design, which is unfortunately accused of being so destructive to the government, of the men I mean, is entirely her own.<sup>1</sup> She neither advised with friends, nor turned over<sup>2</sup> ancient or modern authors, nor prudently submitted to the correction of such as are, or such as think they are good judges, but with an English spirit and genius set out upon the forlorn hope, meaning no hurt to anybody, nor designing any thing but the public good, and to retrieve, if possible, the native liberty, the rights and privileges of the subject.

Far be it from her to stir up sedition of any sort, none can abhor it more; and she heartily wishes that our masters<sup>3</sup> would pay their civil and ecclesiastical governors the same submission which they themselves exact from their domestic subjects. Nor can she imagine how she any way undermines the masculine empire or blows the trumpet of rebellion to the moiety<sup>4</sup> of mankind. Is it by exhorting women not to expect to have their own will in any thing, but to be entirely submissive when once they have made choice of a lord and master, though he happen not to be so wise, so kind, or even so just a governor as was expected?<sup>5</sup> She did not indeed advise them to think his folly wisdom, nor his brutality that love and worship he promised in his matrimonial oath, for this required a flight of wit and sense much above her poor ability, and proper only to masculine understandings. However she did not in any manner prompt them to resist or to abdicate the perjured spouse, though the laws of God and the land make special provision for it in a case wherein, as is to be feared, few men can truly plead not guilty.<sup>6</sup>

1. As in earlier editions, Astell does not put her name on the third edition's title page, but she here affirms that she, the author, is a woman (referring to herself in the third person).

2. Ransacked.

3. Men in general, masters of women.

4. Half; here referring to the female half of humankind.

5. Astell advises in the body of Some Reflections upon Marriage that women accept their marriages, no matter how tyrannical their husbands are.

6. In Astell's time, both ecclesiastical and civil law allowed wives the right to petition for legal separation (not divorce) from husbands who were egregiously, physically cruel to them.

If mankind had never sinned, reason would always have been obeyed, there would have been no struggle for dominion, and brutal power would not have prevailed. But in the lapsed state of mankind, and now that men will not be guided by their reason but by their appetites, and do not what they ought but what they can, the reason, or that which stands for it, the will and pleasure of the governor, is to be the reason of those who will not be guided by their own, and must take place for order's sake, although it should not be conformable to right reason. Nor can there be any society great or little, from empires down to private families, without a last resort to determine the affairs of the society by an irresistible sentence.<sup>7</sup> Now unless this supremacy be fixed somewhere, there will be a perpetual contention about it, such is the love of dominion; and let the reason of things be what it may, those who have least force or cunning to supply it<sup>8</sup> will have the disadvantage. So that since women are acknowledged to have least bodily strength, their being commanded to obey is in pure kindness to them, and for their quiet and security, as well as for the exercise of their virtue.<sup>9</sup> But does it follow that domestic governors have more sense than their subjects, any more than that other governors have? We do not find any man thinks the worse of his own understanding because another has superior power; or concludes himself less capable of a post of honor and authority because he is not preferred<sup>1</sup> to it. How much time would lie on men's hands, how empty would the places of concourse be, and how silent most companies, did men forbear to censure their governors; that is, in effect, to think themselves wiser. Indeed, government would be much more desirable than it is did it invest the possessor with a superior understanding as well as power. And if mere power gives a right to rule, there can be no such thing as usurpation; but a highway-man, so long as he has strength to force, has also a right to require our obedience.

Again, if absolute sovereignty be not necessary in a state, how comes it to be so in a family? or if in a family why not in a state; since no reason can be alleged for the one that will not hold more strongly for the other? If the authority of the husband, so far as it extends, is sacred and inalienable, why not of the prince? The domestic sovereign is without dispute elected,<sup>2</sup> and the stipulations and contracts are mutual. Is it not then partial<sup>3</sup> in men to the last degree to contend for and practice that arbitrary dominion in their families which they abhor and exclaim against in the state? For if arbitrary power is evil in itself, and an improper method of governing rational and free agents, it ought not to be practiced anywhere. Nor is it less but rather more mischievous in families than in kingdoms, by how much 100,000 tyrants are worse than one. What though a husband can't deprive a wife of life without being responsible to the law, he may however do what is much more grievous to a generous mind, render life miserable, for which she has no redress, scarce pity, which is afforded to every other complainant; it being thought a wife's duty to suffer everything without complaint. If all men are horn free, how is it that all women are born slaves? as they must be if the being subjected to the inconstant, tmcertain, unknown, arbitrary will of men be the perfect condition of slaveij?" and if the essence of freedom consists, as our masters say it does, in having a standing rule to livefo?<sup>4</sup> And why is slavery so much condemned and strove against in one case and so highly applauded and held so necessary and so sacred in another?

Again, men are possessed of all places of power, trust, and profit; they make laws and exercise the magistracy. Not only the sharpest sword, but even all the swords and blunderbusses are theirs, which by the strongest logic in the world gives them the best title to everything they please to claim as their prerogative. Who shall contend with them? Immemorial prescription' is on their side in these parts of the world, ancient tradition and modern usage! Our fathers have all along both taught and practiced superiority over the weaker sex, and consequently women are by nature inferior to men, as was to be demonstrated. An argument which must be acknowledged unanswerable; for as well as I love my sex, I will not pretend a reply to such demonstration!

Only let me beg to be informed, to whom we poor fatherless maids and widows who have lost their masters owe subjection? It can't be to all men in general, unless all men were agreed to give the same commands. Do we then fall as strays to the first who finds us? By the maxims of some men and the conduct of some women, one would think so. But whoever he be that thus happens to become our master, if he allows us to be reasonable creatures and does not merely compliment us with that title, since no man denies our readiness to use our tongues, it would tend I should think to our master's advantage, and therefore he may please to be advised, to teach us to improve our reason. But if reason is only allowed us by way of raillery, and the secret maxim is that we have none, or little more than brutes, 'tis the best way to confine us with chain and block to the chimney-corner, which probably might save the estates of some families and the honor of others.

I do not propose this to prevent a rebellion, for women are not so well united as to form an insurrection. They are for the most part wise enough to love their chains and to discern how very becomingly they set. They think as humbly of themselves as their masters can wish with respect to the other sex, but in regard to their own they have a spice of masculine ambition: every one would lead, and none would follow—both sexes being too apt to envy and too backward in emulating, and take more delight in detracting from their neighbor's virtue than in improving their own. And therefore as to those women who find themselves born for slavery and are so sensible of their own meanness as to conclude it impossible to attain to anything excellent, since they are or ought to be best acquainted with their own strength and genius, she's a fool who would attempt their deliverance or improvement. No, let them enjoy the great honor and felicity of their tame, submissive, and depending temper! Let the men applaud and let them glory in this wonderful humility! Let them receive the flatteries and grimaces of the other sex, live unenvied by their own, and be as much beloved as one such woman can afford to love another! Let them enjoy the glory of treading in the footsteps of their predecessors, and of having the prudence to avoid that audacious attempt of soaring beyond their sphere! Let them housewife<sup>6</sup> or play, dress, and be pretty entertaining company! Or, which is better, relieve the poor to ease their own compassions, read pious books, say their prayers and go to church, because they have been taught and used to do so, without being able to give a better reason for their faith and practice! Let them not by any means aspire at being women of understanding, because no man can endure a woman of superior sense or would treat a reasonable woman civilly, but that he thinks he stands on higher ground and that she is so wise as to make exceptions in his favor and to take her measures by his directions. They may pretend to sense indeed since mere pretences only render one the more ridiculous! Let them in short be what is called very women, for this is most acceptable to all sorts of men; or let them aim at the title of good devout women, since some men can bear with this; but let them not judge of the sex by their own scantling.<sup>7</sup> For the great Author of nature and fountain of all perfection never designed that the mean and imperfect, but that the most complete and excellent, of his creatures in every kind should be the standard to the rest.

ANTHONY ASHLEY COOPER, THIRD EARL OF SHAFTESBURY

The third Earl of Shaftesbury's great collection of philosophical essays, Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times (1711), exercised considerable influence throughout the eighteenth century in Britain and on the Continent. The Characteristics brings together his interests in ethics, politics, sociology, nature, the arts, and metaphysics in an idiosyncratic, playful, ironic, at times rambling style, often addressed to unspecified friends (as below) or taking the form of philosophical dialogue between companionable but intellectually opposed interlocutors. These features are the deliberate literary expression of Shaftesbury's corresponding moral and political commitment to tolerant, nondogmatic, free public discussion. He is in important respects a Whig thinker. Grandson of the first earl (the firebrand whom Dryden satirized as Achitophel), and tutored by John Locke at his grandfather's urging, the younger Shaftesbury inherited the distrust of kings and the love of liberty characteristic of his family's politics. But most important he looked ahead, elaborating a philosophical vision attuned more to the gentle ties binding civil society together than to resistance and revolution.

Crucial for him was the concept of "politeness," the social codes and protocols of discourse that enabled people of differing opinions to converse freely without coming to blows. Politeness both expressed and refined humanity's innately sociable, benevolent instincts, in which Shaftesbury fervently believed. This belief put his thought at odds with Thomas Hobbes's philosophy of natural human aggression and provoked Bernard Mandeville to reply cynically that society coheres best when we each selfishly pursue our private interests. But Shaftesbury also perceived the darker power of natural affection: our instinctive "herding principle" could lead us to form parties and factions bitterly opposed to each other, and politeness was our way to civilize such antagonistic passions through conversation. And above that, politeness could lead the way to thoughts of the loftiest philosophical significance: "to philosophize," he notoriously remarked in the Characteristics, "is but to carry good breeding a step higher." It cannot be forgotten that liberty for him was best practiced in public conversation by cultivated male aristocrats. Still, what emerges most strongly in Shaftesbury is his commitment to social openness and his trust that even a satirical, ridiculing, ironic manner may naturally promote an all-inclusive harmony as long as basic good manners are maintained. This faith in the socially cohesive, self-regulating function of satire would be echoed by many defenders of literary wit in the decades to come.

Part 1, Section 1

I have been considering (my friend!) what your fancy was to express such a surprise as you did the other day, when I happened to speak to you in commendation of raillery. Was it possible you should suppose me so grave a man as to dislike all conversation of this kind? Or were you afraid I should not stand the trial, if you put me to it, by making the experiment in my own case?

I must confess, you had reason enough for your caution; if you could imagine me at the bottom so true a zealot as not to bear the least raillery on my own opinions. 'Tis the case, I know, with many. Whatever they think grave or solemn they suppose must never be treated out of a grave and solemn way: though what another thinks so, they can be contented to treat otherwise, and are forward to try the edge of ridicule against any opinion besides their own.

The question is, whether this be fair or no? and whether it be not just and reasonable to make as free with our own opinions, as with those of other people? For to be sparing in this case may be looked upon as a piece of selfishness. We may be charged perhaps with willful ignorance and blind idolatry for having taken opinions upon trust, and consecrated in ourselves certain Idol-Notions, which we will never suffer to be unveiled or seen in open light. They may perhaps be monsters, and not divinities or sacred truths, which are kept thus choicely, in some dark corner of our minds: the specters may impose on us, whilst we refuse to turn 'em every way, and view their shapes and complexions in even' light. For that which can be shown only in a certain light, is questionable. Truth, 'tis supposed, may bear all lights: and one of those principal lights or natural mediums by which things are to be viewed, in order to a thorough recognition, is ridicule itself, or that manner of proof by which we discern whatever is liable to just raillery in any subject. So much, at least, is allowed by all who at any time appeal to this criterion. The gravest gentlemen, even in the gravest subjects, are supposed to acknowledge this: and can have no right, 'tis thought, to deny others the freedom of this appeal, whilst they are free to censure like other men, and in their gravest arguments make no scruple to ask, "Is it not ridiculous?"

Of this affair, therefore, I design<sup>2</sup> you should know fully what my sentiments

1. Common sense (Latin, literal trans.). Here Shaftesbury means something more refined than ordinary good judgment: as he defines it later in the essay, sensus communis for him signifies "sense of public weal and of the common interest, love of the community or society, natural affection, humanity, obligingness, or that sort of civility which rises from a just sense of the common rights of mankind, and the natural equality there is among those of the same species."

2. Intend. "Affair": matter.

are. And by this means you will be able to judge of me, whether I was sincere the other day in the defense of raillery, and can continue still to plead for those ingenious friends of ours, who are often censured for their humor of this kind, and for the freedom they take in such an airy way of conversation and writing.

Part 1, Section 2

In good earnest, when one considers what use is sometimes made of this species of wit, and to what an excess it has risen of late in some characters of the age; one may be started a little, and in doubt what to think of the practice, or whither this rallying humor will at length carry us. It has passed from the men of pleasure to the men of business. Politicians have been infected with it: and the grave affairs of state have been treated with an air of irony and banter. The ablest negotiators have been known the notablest buffoons: the most celebrated authors, the greatest masters of burlesque.

There is indeed a kind of defensive raillery (if I may so call it) which I am willing enough to allow in affairs of whatever kind; when the spirit of curiosity would force a discovery of more truth than can conveniently be told. For we can never do more injury to truth than by discovering too much of it, on some occasions. 'Tis the same with understandings as with eyes: to such a certain size and make, just so much light is necessary, and no more. Whatever is beyond brings darkness and confusion.

'Tis real humanity and kindness to hide strong truths from tender eyes. And to do this by a pleasant amusement is easier and civiler than by a harsh denial or remarkable reserve. But to go about industriously to confound men in a mysterious manner, and to make advantage or draw pleasure from that perplexity they are thrown into by such uncertain talk, is as unhandsome in a way of raillery as when done in the greatest seriousness, or in the most solemn way of deceit. It may be necessary, as well now as heretofore, for wise men to speak in parables, and with a double meaning, that the enemy may be amused, and those only "who have ears to hear, may hear."<sup>3</sup> But 'tis a mean, impotent, and dull sort of wit which amuses all alike and leaves the most sensible man, and even a friend, equally in doubt and at a loss to understand what one's real mind is upon any subject.

This is that gross sort of raillery which is so offensive in good company. And indeed there is as much difference between one sort and another as between fair-dealing and hypocrisy, or between the genteelest wit and the most scurrilous buffoonery. But by freedom of conversation this illiberal kind of wit will lose its credit. For wit is its own remedy. Liberty and commerce bring it to its true standard: the only danger is the laying an embargo. The same thing happens here as in the case of trade. Impositions and restrictions reduce it to a low ebb: nothing is so advantageous to it as a free port.

We have seen in our own time the decline and ruin of a false sort of wit, which so much delighted our ancestors, that their poems and plays, as well as sermons, were full of it. All humor had something of the quibble.<sup>4</sup> The very language of the court was punning. But now 'tis banished the town and all good company: there are only some few footsteps of it in the country; and it seems at last confined to the nurseries of youth as the chief entertainment of pedants and their pupils. And thus in other respects wit will mend upon our hands, and humor will refine itself, if we take care not to tamper with it, and bring it under constraint, by severe usage and rigorous prescriptions. All politeness is owing to liberty. We polish one another and rub off our corners and rough sides by a sort of amicable collision. To restrain this is inevitably to bring a rust upon men's understandings. 'Tis a destroying of civility, good breeding, and even charity itself under pretense of maintaining it.

4. A play on words, a pun. Shaftesbury's attitude in this and other regards resembles Addison's (see Spectator 62, p. 2481), here blending a denunciation of false wit with a promotion of urbane, easy sociability.

JAMES THOMSON

James Thomson's Liberty (1735—36), a poem of some thirty-five hundred lines that portrays British freedom as the culmination of the progress of European civilization, is now no longer much read. But his short ode "Bule, Britannia!" remains one of the nation's most popular patriotic songs. Set to music by Thomas Arne, the poem was composed for Alfred (1740), a masque in honor of Frederick, Prince of Wales, whom opponents of Robert Walpole's administration such as Thomson, Bolingbroke, and Pope supported. Many writers of the era evoke the image of Alfred the Great (849—899) to locate the origins of British liberty in a Gothic past, free of modern corruption: the ode was originally sung by an actor dressed as an ancient bard, accompanied by a British harp. The poem's depiction of Britons as exceptionally unfit for slavery and willing to fight for their freedom at home and abroad both criticizes the contemporary antiwar policy of Walpole and contributes to a national self-image that will shape Britain's role in the world in the centuries to come.

Ode: Rule, Britannia

When Britain first, at heaven's command,
 Arose from out the azure main<sup>0</sup> open ocean
This was the charter of the land,
 And guardian angels sung this strain:
 5 "Rule, Britannia, rule the waves;
Britons never will be slaves."

The nations, not so blest as thee,
 Must, in their turns, to tyrants fall:
 While thou shalt flourish great and free,
 10 The dread and envy of them all.
 "Rule," etc.

Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
 More dreadful, from each foreign stroke:
 As the loud blast that tears the skies,

15 Serves but to root thy native oak.
"Rule," etc.

4

Thee haughty tyrants ne'er shall tame:
All their attempts to bend thee down
Will but arouse thy generous flame;
20 But work their woe, and thy renown.
"Rule," etc.

5

To thee belongs the rural reign;
Thy cities shall with commerce shine:
All thine shall be the subject main,
25 And every shore it circles thine.
"Rule," etc.

The Muses, still<sup>o</sup> with freedom found, always
Shall to thy happy coast repair:
Blest isle! with matchless beauty crowned,
30 And manly hearts to guard the fair.
"Rule, Britannia, rule the waves;
Britons never will be slaves."

DAVID HUME

David Hume (1711—1776) declared that he "was seized very early with a passion for literature," which, he said, "has been the ruling passion of my life, and the great source of my enjoyments." Now we think of Hume as the most devastatingly brilliant of British philosophers. But epistemology and moral philosophy were only part of his larger literary enterprise, and in his time he was known better as an historian and an essayist on various topics—matters of taste, culture, politics, history, economics—than he was as the great philosophical skeptic who undermined commonsense notions of causation and personal identity. The selection printed here comes from Hume's first collection, Essays, Moral and Political (1741; rev. ed. 1742), which, though published anonymously, launched the body of writing that would soon establish his reputation after the disappointing indifference that greeted his massive, brilliant Treatise of Human Nature (1739—40). Hume went on to produce other collections of essays and the popular and influential History of England (1754—62) in six volumes, which surveyed the development of politics, commerce, and the arts and sciences in Great Britain from ancient times to the Revolution of 1688, for the first time, Hume thought, from a nonpartisan perspective. A Scot and a skeptic, Hume was in a position to survey British culture and history from a critical distance that sometimes produced anger or bafflement in his readers, though these reactions augmented more than mitigated his fame. His detractors brought up his reputed atheism when opportunities arose for him to take important public positions—on different occasions he was denied professorships in Scottish universities on these grounds—though his most probing religious writing, including the Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779), was suppressed until after his death.

Hume's style as an essayist is familiar, polished, and urbane; he wears his learning lightly and gracefully. But even these performances reveal a subtle mind unwilling to accept any easy answer or comforting ideological piety. The selection included here celebrates the freedom of the press in Britain, upon which many of Hume's fellow subjects congratulated themselves, in contrast to the heavier legal restrictions imposed on writers on the Continent. But typically for Hume this liberty results less from a high-minded British embrace of rationalized principle than from passion, specifically the intense "jealousy" energizing Britain's mix of monarchy and republic. Later, indeed, he came to have second thoughts: the final version of the essay excises the last three paragraphs praising liberty and dourly concludes that "unbounded liberty of the press . . . is one of those evils, attending those mixed forms of government." The earlier version, reproduced here, offers a more positive view, but still a complex one, noting that the freedom to publish can help contain political rebelliousness even while allowing its expression. The essay is true to Hume's abiding belief that liberty produces a stronger, richer (if not more rational) social fabric.

Of the Liberty of the Press

There is nothing more apt to surprise a foreigner than the extreme liberty we enjoy in this country of communicating whatever we please to the public, and of openly censuring every measure which is entered into by the king or his ministers. If the administration resolve upon war, 'tis affirmed that either willfully or ignorantly they mistake the interest of the nation, and that peace in the present situation of affairs is infinitely preferable. If the passion of the ministers be for peace, our political writers breathe nothing but war and devastation, and represent the pacific conduct of the government as mean and pusillanimous. As this liberty is not indulged in any other government, either republican or monarchical, in Holland and Venice, no more than in France or Spain,<sup>1</sup> it may very naturally give occasion to these two questions: how it happens that Great Britain alone enjoys such a peculiar privilege? and, whether the unlimited exercise of this liberty be advantageous or prejudicial to the public?

As to the first question, why the laws indulge us in such an extraordinary liberty? I believe the reason may be derived from our mixed form of government, which is neither wholly monarchical, nor wholly republican. Twill be found, if I mistake not, a true observation in politics that the two extremes in government, of liberty and slavery, approach nearest to each other; and, that as you depart from the extremes, and mix a little of monarchy with liberty, the government becomes always the more free; and, on the other hand, when you mix a little of liberty with monarchy, the yoke becomes always the more grievous and intolerable.<sup>2</sup> In a government such as that of France, which is entirely absolute, and where laws, custom, and religion all concur to make the people fully satisfied with their condition, the monarch cannot entertain the least jealousy<sup>3</sup> against his subjects, and is therefore apt to indulge them in great liberties both of speech and action. In a government altogether republican such as that of Holland, where there is no magistrate<sup>4</sup> so eminent as to give jealousy to the state, there is also no danger in intrusting the magistrates with very large discretionary powers, and though many advantages result from such powers in the preservation of peace and order; yet they lay a considerable restraint on men's actions, and make every private subject pay a great respect to the government. Thus it is evident that the two extremes of absolute monarchy and of a republic approach very near to each other in the most material circumstances. In the first, the magistrate has no jealousy of the people: in the second, the people have no jealousy of the magistrate: which want of jealousy begets a mutual confidence and trust in both cases, and produces a species of liberty in monarchies and of arbitrary power in republics.

To justify the other part of the foregoing observation, that in every government the means are most wide of each other, and that the mixtures of monarchy and liberty render the yoke either more easy or more grievous; I must take notice of a remark of Tacitus with regard to the Romans under the emperors, that they neither could bear total slavery nor total liberty: Nec totam servitutem, nec totam libertatem pati possunt.<sup>5</sup> This remark a famous poet has translated and applied to the English in his admirable description of Queen Elizabeth's policy and happy government.

Et fit aimer son joug a l'Anglois indompte,
Qui ne peut ni servir, ni \ivre en liberte . . .

HENRIADE, liv. I.<sup>6</sup>

According to these remarks, therefore, we are to consider the Roman government as a mixture of despotism and liberty, where the despotism prevailed; and the English government as a mixture of the same kind, but where the liberty predominates. The consequences are exactly conformable to the foregoing observation; and such as may be expected from those mixed forms of government, which beget a mutual watchfulness and jealousy. The Roman emperors were, many of them, the most frightful tyrants that ever disgraced humanity; and 'tis evident their cruelty was chiefly excited by their jealousy, and by their observing that all the great men of Rome bore with impatience the dominion of a family which, but a little before, was noways superior to their own. On the other hand, as the republican part of the government prevails in England, though with a great mixture of monarchy, 'tis obliged for its own preservation to maintain a watchful jealousy over the magistrates, to remove all discretionary powers, and to secure every one's life and fortune by general and inflexible laws. No action must be deemed a crime but what the law has plainly determined to be such: no crime must be imputed to a man but from a legal proof before his judges; and even these judges must be his fellow-subjects, who are obliged by their own interest to have a watchful eye over the encroachments and violence of the ministers. From these causes it proceeds that there is as much liberty, and even, perhaps, licentiousness in Britain, as there were formerly slavery and tyranny in Rome.

These principles account for the great liberty of the press in these kingdoms, beyond what is indulged in any other government. 'Tis sufficiently known that despotic power would soon steal in upon us were we not extreme watchful to prevent its progress, and were there not an easy method of conveying the alarum from one end of the kingdom to the other. The spirit of the people must frequently be roused to curb the ambition of the court; and the dread of rousing this spirit must be employed to prevent that ambition. Nothing is so effectual to this purpose as the liberty of the press, by which all the learning, wit, and genius of the nation may be employed on the side of liberty, and every one be animated to its defense. As long, therefore, as the republican part of our government can maintain itself against the monarchical, it must be extreme jealous<sup>7</sup> of the liberty of the press, as of the utmost importance to its preservation.

Since therefore the liberty of the press is so essential to the support of our mixed government, this sufficiently decides the second question, "Whether this liberty be advantageous or prejudicial?"; there being nothing of greater importance in every state than the preservation of the ancient government, especially if it be a free one. But I would fain go a step farther and assert that such a liberty is attended with so few inconveniencies that it may be claimed as the common right of mankind, and ought to be indulged them almost in every government: except the ecclesiastical, to which indeed it would be fatal. We need not dread from this liberty any such ill consequences as followed from the harangues of the popular demagogues of Athens and tribunes of Rome. A man reads a book or pamphlet alone and coolly. There is none present from whom he can catch the passion by contagion. He is not hurried away by the force and energy of action. And should he be wrought up to never so seditious a humor,<sup>8</sup> there is no violent resolution presented to him by which he can immediately vent his passion. The liberty of the press, therefore, however abused, can scarce ever excite popular tumults or rebellion. And as to those murmurs or secret discontents it may occasion, 'tis better they should get vent in words, that they may come to the knowledge of the magistrate before it be too late, in order to his providing a remedy against them. Mankind, 'tis true, have always a greater propension to believe what is said to the disadvantage of their governors than the contrary; but this inclination is inseparable from them whether they have liberty or not. A whisper may fly as quick and be as pernicious as a pamphlet. Nay, it will be more pernicious, where men are not accustomed to think freely, or distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood.

It has also been found as the experience of mankind increases that the people are no such dangerous monster as they have been represented, and that 'tis in every respect better to guide them like rational creatures than to lead or drive them like brute beasts. Before the United Provinces<sup>9</sup> set the example, toleration was deemed incompatible with good government; and 'twas thought impossible that a number of religious sects could live together in harmony and peace, and have all of them an equal affection to their common country, and to each other. England has set a like example of civil liberty; and though this liberty seems to occasion some small ferment at present, it has not as yet produced any pernicious effects; and it is to be hoped that men, being every day more accustomed to the free discussion of public affairs, will improve in their judgment of them and be with greater difficulty seduced by every idle rumor and popular clamor.

'Tis a very comfortable reflection to the lovers of liberty that this peculiar privilege of Britain is of a kind that cannot easily be wrested from us, but must last as long as our government remains in any degree free and independent. 'Tis seldom that liberty of any kind is lost all at once. Slavery has so frightful an aspect to men accustomed to freedom that it must steal in upon them by degrees, and must disguise itself in a thousand shapes in order to be received. But if the liberty of the press ever be lost, it must be lost all at once. The general laws against sedition and libeling are at present as strong as they possibly can be made. Nothing can impose a farther restraint, but either the clapping an IMPRIMATUR<sup>1</sup> upon the press, or the giving very large discretionary powers to the court to punish whatever displeases them. But these concessions would be such a bare-faced violation of liberty that they will probably be the last efforts of a despotic government. We may conclude that the liberty of Britain is gone for ever when these attempts shall succeed.

EDMUND BURKE

Edmund Burke (1729—1797) commanded both an acute capacity for political analysis and a confident, passionate, often poetic gift for dramatizing what he took to be the stakes of the great historical events of his time. Born and educated in Dublin, the son of an Anglican father and Catholic mother, he came to London in 1750 to study law. But he made his first mark in the world as a philosopher, publishing A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful in 1757, a work that has exercised considerable influence on the study of aesthetics to the present day. Its main claim is that we respond with instinctive feeling to certain objects—beautiful ones with pleasure, sublime ones with a type of pain—before the intervention of reason. His insight into human passion deeply informed his later career in politics, both as an analyst of events and their causes and as the most moving orator of his day. Many of his twenty-nine years in Parliament were spent in opposition: he was a voice of conscience and protest not only against Tory governments in power but often against his fellow Whigs. Most of the time he fought for the losing side. He sought to reconcile Britain with its American colonies and avoid war; argued against the persecution of Irish Catholics; and presided over the trial of Warren Hastings, governor-general of India, whose administration Burke found rapacious and corrupt. To different degrees, such campaigns ended in failure. Some of Burke's most famous and lasting political thinking appears in his works opposing the French Revolution, including Reflections on the Revolution in France (1790). In it he denounces what he saw as the destructively "metaphysical," rationalistic spirit of the revolutionaries, which led them to neglect the ways in which history and human emotions knit the fabric of society together—a neglect that resulted in recklessness and cruelty.

Burke's speech recommending Britain's conciliation with its American colonies (1775), delivered on the eve of the American War for Independence, has powerfully resonated long past its historical moment (for a fuller version of the speech, go to Norton Literature Online). Burke both unfolds the complex origins of liberty in British history and shows how the idea helps establish the very political identity of the people soon to become the citizens of the United States. The speech has long been popular with Americans: in the early nineteenth century, for instance, anti-abolitionists were fond of citing Burke's depiction of the fierce commitment to liberty of the white South (though he had not meant that as praise). Most characteristic of Burke's political thinking is the speech's description of liberty as a complex, concrete reality, not as "abstract liberty," which, "like other mere abstractions, is not to be found." More than an ideal, the meaning of liberty emerges from a richly detailed weave of particular historical processes.

From Speech on the Conciliation with the American Colonies

ft * *

In [the] character of the Americans a love of freedom is the predominating feature which marks and distinguishes the whole: and as an ardent is always a jealous affection, your colonies become suspicious, restive, and untractable, whenever they see the least attempt to wrest from them by force, or shuffle from them by chicane, what they think the only advantage worth living for. This fierce spirit of liberty is stronger in the English colonies, probably, than in any other people of the earth, and this from a great variety of powerful causes; which, to understand the true temper of their minds, and the direction which this spirit takes, it will not be amiss to lay open somewhat more largely.

First, the people of the colonies are descendants of Englishmen. England, Sir, is a nation which still, I hope, respects, and formerly adored, her freedom. The colonists emigrated from you when this part of your character was most predominant; and they took this bias and direction the moment they parted from your hands. They are therefore not only devoted to liberty, but to liberty according to English ideas and on English principles. Abstract liberty, like other mere abstractions, is not to be found. Liberty inheres in some sensible object<sup>1</sup> and every nation has formed to itself some favorite point, which by way of eminence becomes the criterion of their happiness. It happened, you know, Sir, that the great contests for freedom in this country were from the earliest times chiefly upon the question of taxing. Most of the contests in the ancient commonwealths turned primarily on the right of election of magistrates, or on the balance among the several orders of the state. The question of money was not with them so immediate. But in England it was otherwise. On this point of taxes the ablest pens and most eloquent tongues have been exercised, the greatest spirits have acted and suffered. In order to give the fullest satisfaction concerning the importance of this point, it was not only necessary for those who in argument defended the excellence of the English Constitution to insist on this privilege of granting money as a dry point of fact, and to prove that the right had been acknowledged in ancient parchments and blind usages to reside in a certain body called a House of Commons: they went much further: they attempted to prove, and they succeeded, that in theory it ought to be so, from the particular nature of a House of Commons, as an immediate representative of the people, whether the old records had delivered this oracle or not. They took infinite pains to inculcate, as a fundamental principle, that in all monarchies the people must in effect themselves, mediately or immediately, possess the power of granting their own money, or no shadow of liberty could subsist. The colonies draw from you, as with their life-blood, these ideas and principles. Their love of liberty, as with you, fixed and attached on this specific point of taxing. Liberty might be safe or might be endangered in twenty other particulars without their being much pleased or alarmed. Here they felt its pulse; and as they found that beat, they thought themselves sick or sound. I do not say whether they were right or wrong in applying your general arguments to their own case. It is not easy, indeed, to make a monopoly of theorems and corollaries. The fact is, that they did thus apply those general arguments; and your mode of governing them, whether through lenity or indolence, through wisdom or mistake, confirmed them in the imagination, that they, as well as you, had an interest in these common principles.

They were further confirmed in this pleasing error by the form of their provincial legislative assemblies. Their governments are popular in an high degree: some are merely<sup>2</sup> popular; in all, the popular representative is the most weighty; and this share of the people in their ordinary government never fails to inspire them with lofty sentiments, and with a strong aversion from whatever tends to deprive them of their chief importance.

If anything were wanting to this necessary operation of the form of government, religion would have given it a complete effect. Religion, always a principle of energy, in this new people is no way worn out or impaired; and their mode of professing it is also one main cause of this free spirit. The people are Protestants, and of that kind which is the most adverse to all implicit submission of mind and opinion. This is a persuasion not only favorable to liberty, but built upon it. I do not think, Sir, that the reason of this averseness in the dissenting churches from all that looks like absolute government is so much to be sought in their religious tenets as in their history. Every one knows that the Roman Catholic religion is at least coeval with most of the governments where it prevails, that it has generally gone hand in hand with them, and received a great favor and every kind of support from authority. The Church of England, too, was formed from her cradle under the nursing care of regular government. But the dissenting interests have sprung up in direct opposition to all the ordinary powers of the world, and could justify that opposition only on a strong claim to natural liberty. Their very existence depended on the powerful and unremitted assertion of that claim. All Protestantism, even the most cold and passive, is a sort of dissent. But the religion most prevalent in our northern colonies is a refinement on the principle of resistance: it is the dissidence of dissent, and the protestantism of the Protestant religion. This religion, under a variety of denominations agreeing in nothing but in the communion of the spirit of liberty, is predominant in most of the northern provinces, where the Church of England, notwithstanding its legal rights, is in reality no more than a sort of private sect, not composing, most probably, the tenth of the people. The colonists left England when this spirit was high, and in the emigrants was the highest of all; and even that stream of foreigners which has been constantly flowing into these colonies has, for the greatest part, been composed of dissenters from the establishments of their several countries, and have brought with them a temper and character far from alien to that of the people with whom they mixed.

Sir, I can perceive, by their manner, that some gentlemen object to the latitude of this description, because in the southern colonies the Church of England forms a large body, and has a regular establishment. It is certainly true. There is, however, a circumstance attending these colonies, which, in my opinion, fully counterbalances this difference, and makes the spirit of liberty still more high and haughty than in those to the northward. It is, that in Virginia and the Carolinas they have a vast multitude of slaves. Where this is the case in any part of the world, those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom. Freedom is to them not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. Not seeing there, that freedom, as in countries where it is a common blessing, and as broad and general as the air, may be united with much abject toil, with great misery, with all the exterior of servitude, liberty looks, amongst them, like something that is more noble and liberal. I do not mean, Sir, to commend the superior morality of this sentiment, which has at least as much pride as virtue in it,<sup>3</sup> but I cannot alter the nature of man. The fact is so; and these people of the southern colonies are much more strongly, and with an higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty, than those to the northward. Such were all the ancient commonwealths; such were our Gothic ancestors; such in our days were the Poles;<sup>4</sup> and such will be all masters of slaves, who are not slaves themselves. In such a people, the haughtiness of domination combines with the spirit of freedom, fortifies it, and renders it invincible.

2. Entirely. "Popular": elected by the people. In 18th-century England the masses could not vote.

Permit me, Sir, to add another circumstance in our colonies, which contributes no mean part towards the growth and effect of this untractable spirit: I mean their education. In no country, perhaps, in the world is the law so general a study. <sup>4</sup> s * This study renders men acute, inquisitive, dexterous, prompt in attack, ready in defense, full of resources. In other countries, the people, more simple, and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil, and judge the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance, and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

The last cause of this disobedient spirit in the colonies is hardly less powerful than the rest, as it is not merely moral, but laid deep in the natural constitution of things. Three thousand miles of ocean lie between you and them. No contrivance can prevent the effect of this distance in weakening government. Seas roll, and months pass, between the order and the execution; and the want of a speedy explanation of a single point is enough to defeat an whole system. You have, indeed, winged ministers of vengeance, who carry your bolts in their pounces<sup>5</sup> to the remotest verge of the sea: but there a power steps in, that limits the arrogance of raging passions and furious elements, and says, "So far shalt thou go, and no farther."<sup>6</sup> Who are you, that should fret and rage, and bite the chains of Nature? Nothing worse happens to you than does to all nations who have extensive empire; and it happens in all the forms into which empire can be thrown. In large bodies, the circulation of power must be less vigorous at the extremities. Nature has said it. The Turk cannot govern Egypt, and Arabia, and Kurdistan, as he governs Thrace; nor has he the same dominion in Crimea and Algiers which he has at Brusa and Smyrna. Despotism itself is obliged to truck and huckster. The Sultan gets such obedience as he can. He governs with a loose rein, that he may govern at all; and the whole of the force and vigor of his authority in his center is derived from a prudent relaxation in all his borders. Spain, in her provinces, is perhaps not so well obeyed as you are in yours. She complies, too; she submits; she watches times. This is the immutable condition, the eternal law, of extensive and detached empire.

Then, Sir, from these six capital sources, of descent, of form of government, of religion in the northern provinces, of manners in the southern, of education, of the remoteness of situation from the first mover of government—from all these causes a fierce spirit of liberty has grown up. It has grown with the growth of the people in your colonies, and increased with the increase of their wealth: a spirit, that, unhappily meeting with an exercise of power in England, which, however lawful, is not reconcilable to any ideas of liberty, much less with theirs, has kindled this flame that is ready to consume us.

SAMUEL JOHNSON

Samuel Johnson detested slavery and the owners of slaves. Once, "in company with some very grave men at Oxford, his toast was, 'Here's to the next insurrection of the Negroes in the West Indies,' " and in his pamphlet Taxation No Tyranny (1775), he put the American rebels down with a devastating question: "How is it that we hear the loudest yelps for liberty among the drivers of Negroes?" Although slavery had been abolished in England in 1772, serfdom still existed in Scotland, and the British remained heavily involved in the slave trade. In 1777 a black slave, Joseph Knight, sued for freedom from the Scottish master he had escaped. On his behalf Johnson dictated this argument to Boswell.

[A Brief to Free a Slave]

It must be agreed that in most ages many countries have had part of their inhabitants in a state of slavery; yet it may be doubted whether slavery can ever be supposed the natural condition of man. It is impossible not to conceive that men in their original state were equal; and very difficult to imagine how one would be subjected to another but by violent compulsion. An individual may, indeed, forfeit his liberty by a crime; but he cannot by that crime forfeit the liberty of his children. What is true of a criminal seems true likewise of a captive. A man may accept life from a conquering enemy on condition of perpetual servitude; but it is very doubtful whether he can entail<sup>1</sup> that servitude on his descendants; for no man can stipulate without commission for another. The condition which he himself accepts, his son or grandson perhaps would have rejected. If we should admit, what perhaps may with more reason be denied, that there are certain relations between man and man which may make slavery necessary and just,<sup>2</sup> yet it can never be proved that he who is now suing for his freedom ever stood in any of those relations. He is certainly subject by no law, but that of violence, to his present master,<sup>3</sup> who pretends no claim to his obedience, but that he bought him from a merchant of slaves, whose right to sell him never was examined. It is said that, according to the constitutions of Jamaica, he was legally enslaved; these constitutions are merely positive;<sup>4</sup> and apparently injurious to the rights of mankind, because whoever is exposed to sale is condemned to slavery without appeal; by whatever fraud or violence he might have been originally brought into the merchant's power. In our own time princes have been sold, by wretches to whose care they were entrusted, that they might have an European education; but when once they were brought to a market in the plantations, little would avail either their dignity or their wrongs. The laws of Jamaica afford a Negro no redress. His color is considered as a sufficient testimony against him. It is to be lamented that moral right should ever give way to political convenience. But if temptations of interest are sometimes too strong for human virtue, let us at least retain a virtue where there is no temptation to quit it. In the present case there is apparent right on one side, and no convenience on the other. Inhabitants of this island can neither gain riches nor power by taking away the liberty of any part of the human species. The sum of the argument is this:—No man is by nature the property of another: The defendant is, therefore, by nature free: The rights of nature must be some way forfeited before they can be justly taken away: That the defendant has by any act forfeited the rights of nature we require to be proved; and if no proof of such forfeiture can be given, we doubt not but the justice of the court will declare him free.'

OLAUDAH EOUIANO

The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olandah Eqniano, or Gnstavus Vassa, the African, Written by Himself, published in 1789, is the classic story of an eighteenth-century African's descent into slavery and rise to freedom. Baised in an Ibo village (in modern Nigeria), Olaudah Equiano (ca. 1745—1797) was kidnapped by African raiders and sold into slavery. He survived the horrors of the Middle Passage to the New World, where an English naval officer bought him to serve as a cabin boy and renamed him Gustavus Vassa, after a sixteenth-century Swedish hero who freed his people from the Danes (such names concealed the status of a slave, because slavery was frowned on by the British Navy). During years at sea, as well as a period at a London school, Equiano acquired a basic education. He was also baptized, which many slaves expected to make them free. But his hopes were cruelly disappointed when, after six years' service, he was suddenly sold and shipped to the West Indies. There a Quaker merchant, Robert King, purchased him, employed him as a clerk and seaman, and eventually allowed him, in 1766, to buy his freedom. Equiano went back to England, working first as a hairdresser and later voyaging all over the world, even taking part in an effort to find a passage to India by way of the North Pole. In the 1780s he became involved in the abolitionist movement. The story of his life was an important contribution to that movement, not only for its explicit arguments against the slave trade but also for its demonstration that someone born in Africa could be humane, intelligent, a good Christian, and a free and eloquent British subject. The book went through many editions and made Equiano famous. He married an Englishwoman, fathered two daughters, and died in London in 1797.

The Life of Equiano combines several literary genres. It is a captivity narrative, a spiritual autobiography, a travel memoir, an adventure story, and an abolitionist tract. The early chapters describe the healthy, cheerful, arid virtuous life of Africans, contrasted with European inhumanity, and the later chapters show how much a black man can achieve, when given a chance. Equiano does not disguise the strains of his position as he is pulled between different identities and different worlds. His main purpose, however, is clearly to force his readers to face the ordeals a slave must endure—to live in his skin. If Oroonoko taught Europeans to sympathize with Africans, Equiano taught them that a black man could speak for himself.

The first object which saluted my eyes when I arrived on the coast was the sea, and a slave ship, which was then riding at anchor, and waiting for its cargo. These filled me with astonishment, which was soon converted into terror when I was carried on board. I was immediately handled and tossed up to see if I were sound by some of the crew; and I was now persuaded that I had gotten into a world of bad spirits, and that they were going to kill me. Their complexions too differing so much from ours, their long hair, and the language they spoke, (which was very different from any I had ever heard) united to confirm me in this belief. Indeed such were the horrors of my views and fears at the moment, that, if ten thousand worlds had been my own, I would have freely parted with them all to have exchanged my condition with that of the meanest slave in my own country. When I looked round the ship too and saw a large furnace of copper boiling, and a multitude of black people of every description chained together, every one of their countenances expressing dejection and sorrow, I no longer doubted of my fate; and, quite overpowered with horror and anguish, I fell motionless on the deck and fainted. When I recovered a little I found some black people about me, who I believe were some of those who brought me on board, and had been receiving their pay; they talked to me in order to cheer me, but all in vain. I asked them if we were not to be eaten by those white men with horrible looks, red faces, and loose hair. They told me I was not; and one of the crew brought me a small portion of spirituous liquor in a wine glass; but, being afraid of him, I would not take it out of his hand. One of the blacks therefore took it from him and gave it to me, and I took a little down my palate, which, instead of reviving me, as they thought it would, threw me into the greatest consternation at the strange feeling it produced, having never tasted any such liquor before. Soon after this the blacks who brought me on board went off, and left me abandoned to despair. I now saw myself deprived of all chance of returning to my native country, or even the least glimpse of hope of gaining the shore, which I now considered as friendly; and I even wished for my former slavery in preference to my present situation, which was filled with horrors of every kind, still heightened by my ignorance of what I was to undergo. I was not long suffered to indulge my grief; I was soon put down under the decks, and there I received such a salutation in my nostrils as I had never experienced in my life; so that, with the loathsomeness of the stench, and crying together, I became so sick and low that I was not able to eat, nor had I the least desire to taste any thing. I now wished for the last friend, death, to relieve me; but soon, to my grief, two of the white men offered me eatables; and, on my refusing to eat, one of them held me fast by the hands, and laid me across I think the windlass, and tied my feet, while the other flogged me severely. I had never experienced any thing of this kind before; and although, not being used to the water, I naturally feared that element the first time I saw it, yet nevertheless, could I have got over the nettings,<sup>2</sup> I would have jumped over the side, but I could not; and, besides, the crew used to watch us very closely who were not chained down to the decks, lest we should leap into the water; and I have seen some of these poor African prisoners most severely cut for attempting to do so, and hourly whipped for not eating. This indeed was often the case with myself. In a little time after, amongst the poor chained men, I found some of my own nation, which in a small degree gave ease to my mind. I inquired of these what was to be done with us; they gave me to understand we were to be carried to these white people's country to work for them. I then was a little revived, and thought, if it were no worse than working, my situation was not so desperate: but still I feared I should be put to death, the white people looked and acted, as I thought, in so savage a manner; for I had never seen among any people such instances of brutal cruelty; and this not only shewn towards us blacks, but also to some of the whites themselves. One white man in particular I saw, when we were permitted to be on deck, flogged so unmercifully with a large rope near the foremast, that he died in consequence of it; and they tossed him over the side as they would have done a brute. This made me fear these people the more; and I expected nothing less than to be treated in the same manner. I could not help expressing my fears and apprehensions to some of my countrymen: I asked them if these people had no country, but lived in this hollow place (the ship): they told me they did not, but came from a distant one. "Then," said I, "how comes it in all our country we never heard of them?" They told me because they lived so very far off. I then asked where were their women? had they any like themselves? I was told they had: "and why," said I, "do we not see them?" they answered, because they were left behind. I asked how the vessel could go? they told me they could not tell; but that there were cloths put upon the masts by the help of the ropes I saw, and then the vessel went on; and the white men had some spell or magic they put in the water when they liked in order to stop the vessel. I was exceedingly amazed at this account, and really thought they were spirits. I therefore wished much to be from amongst them, for I expected they would sacrifice me: but my wishes were vain; for we were so quartered that it was impossible for any of us to make our escape. While we stayed on the coast I was mostly on deck; and one day, to my great astonishment, I saw one of these vessels coming in with the sails up. As soon as the whites saw it, they gave a great shout, at which we were amazed; and the more so as the vessel appeared larger by approaching nearer. At last she came to an anchor in my sight, and when the anchor was let go I and my countrymen who saw it were lost in astonishment to observe the vessel stop; and were now convinced it was done by magic. Soon after this the other ship got her boats out, and they came on board of us, and the people of both ships seemed very glad to see each other. Several of the strangers also shook hands with us black people, and made motions with their hands, signifying I suppose we were to go to their country; but we did not understand them. At last, when the ship we were in had got in all her cargo, they made ready with many fearful noises, and we were all put under deck, so that we could not see how they managed the vessel. But this disappointment was the least of my sorrow. The stench of the hold while we were on the coast was so intolerably loathsome, that it was dangerous to remain there for any time, and some of us had been permitted to stay on the deck for the fresh air; but now that the whole ship's cargo were confined together, it became absolutely pestilential. The closeness of the place, and the heat of the climate, added to the number in the ship, which was so crowded that each had scarcely room to turn himself, almost suffocated us. This produced copious perspirations, so that the air soon became unfit for respiration, from a variety of loathsome smells, and brought on a sickness among the slaves, of which many died, thus falling victims to the improvident avarice, as I may call it, of their purchasers. This wretched situation was again aggravated by the galling of the chains, now become insupportable; and the filth of the necessary tubs,<sup>3</sup> into which the children often fell, and were almost suffocated. The shrieks of the women, and the groans of the dying, rendered the whole a scene of horror almost inconceivable. Happily perhaps for myself I was soon reduced so low here that it was thought necessary to keep me almost always on deck; and from<sup>4</sup> my extreme youth I was not put in fetters. In this situation I expected every hour to share the fate of my companions, some of whom were almost daily brought upon deck at the point of death, which I began to hope would soon put an end to my miseries. Often did I think many of the inhabitants of the deep much more happy than myself. I envied them the freedom they enjoyed, and as often wished I could change my condition for theirs. Every circumstance I met with served only to render my state more painful, and heighten my apprehensions, and my opinion of the cruelty of the whites. One day they had taken a number of fishes; and when they had killed and satisfied themselves with as many as they thought fit, to our astonishment who were on the deck, rather than give any of them to us to eat as we expected, they tossed the remaining fish into the sea again, although we begged and prayed for some as well as we could, but in vain; and some of my countrymen, being pressed by hunger, took an opportunity, when they thought no one saw them, of trying to get a little privately; but they were discovered, and the attempt procured them some very severe floggings.

One day<sup>1</sup>, when we had a smooth sea and moderate wind, two of my wearied countrymen who were chained together (I was near them at the time), preferring death to such a life of misery, somehow made through the nettings and jumped into the sea; immediately another quite dejected fellow, who, on account of his illness, was suffered to be out of irons, also followed their example; and I believe many more would very soon have done the same if they had not been prevented by the ship's crew, who were instantly alarmed. Those of us that were the most active were in a moment put down under the deck, and there was such a noise and confusion amongst the people of the ship as I never heard before, to stop her, and get the boat out to go after the slaves. However two of the wretches were drowned, but they got the other, and afterwards flogged him unmercifully for thus attempting to prefer death to slavery. In this manner we continued to undergo more hardships than I can now relate, hardships which are inseparable from this accursed trade. Many a time we were near suffocation from the want of fresh air, which we were often without for whole days together. This, and the stench of the necessary tubs, carried off many. During our passage I first saw flying fishes, which surprised me very much: they used frequently to fly across the ship, and many of them fell on the deck. I also now first saw the use of the quadrant; I had often with astonishment seen the mariners make observations with it, and I could not think what it meant. They at last took notice of my surprise; and one of them, willing to increase it, as well as to gratify my curiosity, made me one day look through it. The clouds appeared to me to be land, which disappeared as they passed along. This heightened my wonder; and I was now more persuaded than ever that I was in another world, and that every thing about me was magic. At last we came in sight of the island of Barbados,<sup>1</sup> at which the whites on board gave a great shout, and made many signs of joy to us. We did not know what to think of this; but as the vessel drew nearer we plainly saw the harbor, and other ships of different kinds and sizes; and we soon anchored amongst them off Bridge Town. Many merchants and planters now came on board, though it was in the evening. They put us in separate parcels,<sup>6</sup> and examined us attentively. They also made us jump, and pointed to the land, signifying we were to go there. We thought by this we should be eaten by these ugly men, as they appeared to us; and, when soon after we were all put down under the deck again, there was much dread and trembling among us, and nothing but bitter cries to be heard all the night from these apprehensions, insomuch that at last the white people got some old slaves from the land to pacify us. They told us we were not to be eaten, but to work, and were soon to go on land, where we should see many of our country people. This report eased us much; and sure enough, soon after we were landed, there came to us Africans of all languages. We were conducted immediately to the merchant's yard, where we were pent up altogether like so many sheep in a fold, without regard to sex or age. As every object was new to me, every thing I saw filled me with surprise. What struck me first was that the houses were built with stories, and in every other respect different from those in Africa; but I was still more astonished on seeing people on horseback. I did not know what this could mean; and indeed I thought these people were full of nothing but magical arts. While I was in this astonishment one of my fellow prisoners spoke to a countryman of his about the horses, who said they were the same kind they had in their country. I understood them, though they were from a distant part of Africa, and I thought it odd I had not seen any horses there; but afterwards, when I came to converse with different Africans, I found they had many horses amongst them, and much larger than those I then saw. We were not many days in the merchant's custody before we were sold after their usual manner, which is this:—On a signal given (as the beat of a drum) the buyers rush at once into the yard where the slaves are confined, and make a choice of that parcel they like best. The noise and clamor with which this is attended, and the eagerness visible in the countenances of the buyers, serve not a little to increase the apprehensions of the terrified Africans, who may well be supposed to consider them as the ministers of that destruction to which they think themselves devoted.<sup>7</sup> In this manner, without scruple, are relations and friends separated, most of them never to see each other again. I remember in the vessel in which I was brought over, in the men's apartment, there were several brothers, who, in the sale, were sold in different lots; and it was very moving on this occasion to see and hear their cries at parting. O, ye nominal Christians! might not an African ask you, learned you this from your God, who says unto you, Do unto all men as you would men should do unto you? Is it not enough that we are torn from our country and friends to toil for your luxury and lust of gain? Must every tender feeling be likewise sacrificed to your avarice? Are the dearest friends and relations, now rendered more dear by their separation from their kindred, still to be parted from each other, and thus prevented from cheering the gloom of slavery with the small comfort of being together and mingling their sufferings and sorrows? Why are parents to lose their children, brothers their sisters, or husbands their wives? Surely this is a new refinement in cruelty, which, while it has no advantage to atone for it, thus aggravates distress, and adds fresh horrors even to the wretchedness of slavery.

[A FREE MAN]<sup>8</sup>

Every day now brought me nearer my freedom, and I was impatient till we proceeded again to sea, that I might have an opportunity of getting a sum large enough to purchase it. I was not long ungratified; for, in the beginning of the year 1766, my master bought another sloop, named the Nancy, the largest I had ever seen. She was partly laden, and was to proceed to Philadelphia; our Captain had his choice of three, and I was well pleased he chose this, which was the largest; for, from his having a large vessel, I had more room, and could carry a larger quantity of goods with me. Accordingly, when we had delivered our old vessel, the Prudence, and completed the lading of the Nancy, having made near three hundred per cent, by four barrels of pork I brought from Charlestown, I laid in as large a cargo as I could, trusting to God's providence to prosper my undertaking. With these views I sailed for Philadelphia. On our passage, when we drew near the land, I was for the first time surprised at the sight of some whales, having never seen any such large sea monsters before; and as we sailed by the land one morning I saw a puppy whale close by the vessel; it was about the length of a wherry boat, and it followed us all the day

8. Frustrated in his hope to be set free in England, Equiano is shipped to Montserrat, a British colony in the Leeward Islands of the West Indies. Robert King, a prosperous Quaker merchant from Philadelphia, buys him, treats him kindly, and values till we got within the Capes. We arrived safe and in good time at Philadelphia, and I sold my goods there chiefly to the Quakers. They always appeared to be a very honest discreet sort of people, and never attempted to impose on me; I therefore liked them, and ever after chose to deal with them in preference to any others.

One Sunday morning while I was here, as I was going to church, I chanced to pass a meeting house. The doors being open, and the house full of people, it excited my curiosity to go in. When I entered the house, to my great surprise, I saw a very tall woman standing in the midst of them, speaking in an audible voice something which I could not understand. Having never seen anything of this kind before, I stood and stared about me for some time, wondering at this odd scene. As soon as it was over I took an opportunity to make inquiry about the place and people, when I was informed they were called Quakers.<sup>9</sup> I particularly asked what that woman I saw in the midst of them had said, but none of them were pleased to satisfy me; so I quitted them, and soon after, as I was returning, I came to a church crowded with people; the church-yard was full likewise, and a number of people were even mounted on ladders, looking in at the windows. I thought this a strange sight, as I had never seen churches, either in England or the West Indies, crowded in this manner before. I therefore made bold to ask some people the meaning of all this, and they told me the Rev. Mr. George Whitfield<sup>1</sup> was preaching. I had often heard of this gentleman, and had wished to see and hear him; but I had never before had an opportunity. I now therefore resolved to gratify myself with the sight, and I pressed in amidst the multitude. When I got into the church I saw this pious man exhorting the people with the greatest fervor and earnestness, and sweating as much as I ever did while in slavery on Montserrat beach. I was very much struck and impressed with this; I thought it strange I had never seen divines exert themselves in this manner before, and I was no longer at a loss to account for the thin congregations they preached to.

When we had discharged our cargo here, and were loaded again, we left this fruitful land once more, and set sail for Montserrat. My traffic had hitherto succeeded so well with me, that I thought, by selling my goods when we arrived at Montserrat, I should have enough to purchase my freedom. But, as soon as our vessel arrived there, my master came on board, and gave orders for us to go to St. Eustatia,<sup>2</sup> and discharge our cargo there, and from thence proceed for Georgia. I was much disappointed at this; but thinking, as usual, it was of no use to murmur at the decrees of fate, I submitted without repining, and we went to St. Eustatia. After we had discharged our cargo there we took in a live cargo, as we call a cargo of slaves. Here I sold my goods tolerably well; but, not being able to lay out all my money in this small island to as much advantage as in many other places, I laid out only part, and the remainder I brought away with me neat.<sup>3</sup> We sailed from hence for Georgia, and I was glad when we got there, though I had not much reason to like the place from my last adventure in Savannah;<sup>4</sup> but I longed to get back to Montserrat and procure my freedom, which I expected to be able to purchase when I returned. As soon as we arrived here I waited on my careful doctor, Mr. Brady, to whom I made the most grateful acknowledgments in my power for his former kindness and attention during my illness.

While we were here an odd circumstance happened to the Captain and me, which disappointed us both a good deal. A silversmith, whom we had brought to this place some voyages before, agreed with the Captain to return with us to the West Indies, and promised at the same time to give the Captain a great deal of money, having pretended to take a liking to him, and being, as we thought, very rich. But while we stayed to load our vessel this man was taken ill in a house where he worked, and in a week's time became very bad. The worse he grew the more he used to speak of giving the Captain what he had promised him, so that he expected something considerable from the death of this man, who had no wife or child, and he attended him day and night. I used also to go with the Captain, at his own desire, to attend him; especially when we saw there was no appearance of his recovery; and, in order to recompense me for my trouble, the Captain promised me ten pounds, when he should get the man's property. I thought this would be of great service to me, although I had nearly money enough to purchase my freedom, if I should get safe this voyage to Montserrat. In this expectation I laid out above eight pounds of my money for a suit of superfine clothes to dance with at my freedom, which I hoped was then at hand. We still continued to attend this man, and were with him even on the last day he lived, till very late at night, when we went on board. After we were got to bed, about one or two o'clock in the morning, the Captain was sent for, and informed the man was dead. On this he came to my bed, and, waking me, informed me of it, and desired me to get up and procure a light, and immediately go to him. I told him I was very sleepy, and wished he would take somebody else with him, or else, as the man was dead, and could want no farther attendance, to let all things remain as they were till next morning. "No, no," said he, "we will have the money tonight, I cannot wait till tomorrow; so let us go." Accordingly I got up and struck a light, and away we both went and saw the man as dead as we could wish. The Captain said he would give him a grand burial, in gratitude for the promised treasure; and desired that all the things belonging to the deceased might be brought forth. Among others, there was a nest of trunks of which he had kept the keys whilst the man was ill, and when they were produced we opened them with no small eagerness and expectation; and as there were a great number within one another, with much impatience we took them one out of the other. At last, when we came to the smallest, and had opened it, we saw it was full of papers, which we supposed to be notes; at the sight of which our hearts leapt for joy; and that instant the Captain, clapping his hands, cried out, "Thank God, here it is." But when we took up the trunk, and began to examine the supposed treasure and long-looked-for bounty, (alas! alas! how uncertain and deceitful are all human affairs!) what had we found! While we were embracing a substance we grasped an empty nothing. The whole amount that was in the nest of trunks was only one dollar and a half; and all that the man possessed would not pay for his coffin. Our sudden and exquisite joy was now succeeded by as sudden and exquisite pain; and my Captain and I exhibited, for some time, most ridiculous figures—pictures of chagrin and disappointment! We went away greatly mortified, and left the deceased to do as well as he could for himself, as we had taken so good care of him when alive for nothing. We set sail once more for Montserrat, and arrived there safe; but much out of humor with our friend the silversmith. When we had unladen the vessel, and I had sold my venture, finding myself master of about forty-seven pounds, I consulted my true friend, the Captain, how I should proceed in offering my master the money for my freedom. He told me to come on a certain morning, when he and my master would be at breakfast together. Accordingly, on that morning I went, and met the Captain there, as he had appointed. When I went in I made my obeisance to my master, and with my money in my hand, and many fears in my heart, I prayed him to be as good as his offer to me, when he was pleased to promise me my freedom as soon as I could purchase it. This speech seemed to confound him; he began to recoil; and my heart that instant sank within me. "What," said he, "give you your freedom? Why, where did you get the money? Have you got forty pounds sterling?" "Yes, sir," I answered. "How did you get it?" replied he. I told him, very honestly. The Captain then said he knew I got the money very honestly and with much industry, and that I was particularly careful. On which my master replied, I got money much faster than he did; and said he would not have made me the promise he did if he had thought I should have got money so soon. "Come, come," said my worthy Captain, clapping my master on the back, "Come, Robert" (which was his name), "I think you must let him have his freedom; you have laid your money out very well; you have received good interest for it all this time, and here is now the principal at last. I know Gustavus has earned you more than an hundred a-year, and he will still save you money, as he will not leave you:—Come, Robert, take the money." My master then said, he would not be worse than his promise; and, taking the money, told me to go to the Secretary at the Register Office, and get my manumission<sup>5</sup> drawn up. These words of my master were like a voice from heaven to me: in an instant all my trepidation was turned into unutterable bliss; and I most reverently bowed myself with gratitude, unable to express my feelings, but by the overflowing of my eyes, while my true and worthy friend, the Captain, congratulated us both with a peculiar degree of heartfelt pleasure. As soon as the first transports of my joy were over, and that I had expressed my thanks to these my worthy friends in the best manner I was able, I rose with a heart full of affection and reverence, and left the room, in order to obey my master's joyful mandate of going to the Register Office. As I was leaving the house I called to mind the words of the Psalmist, in the 126th Psalm, and like him, "I glorified God in my heart, in whom I trusted." These words had been impressed on my mind from the very day I was forced from Deptford<sup>6</sup> to the present hour, and I now saw them, as I thought, fulfilled and verified. My imagination was all rapture as I flew to the Register Office, and in this respect, like the apostle Peter<sup>7</sup> (whose deliverance from prison was so sudden and extraordinary, that he thought he was in a vision), I could scarcely believe I was awake. Heavens! who could do justice to my feelings at this moment! Not conquering heroes themselves, in the midst of a triumph—Not the tender mother who had just regained her long-lost infant, and presses it to her heart—Not the weary hungry mariner, at the sight of the desired friendly port—Not the lover, when he once more embraces his beloved mistress, after she had been ravished from his arms!—All within my breast was tumult, wildness, and delirium! My feet scarcely touched the ground, for they were winged with joy, and, like Elijah, as he rose to Heaven,<sup>8</sup> they "were with lightning sped as I went on." Every one I met I told of my happiness, and blazed about the virtue of my amiable master and captain.

When I got to the office and acquainted the Register with my errand he congratulated me on the occasion, and told me he would draw up my manumission for half price, which was a guinea. I thanked him for his kindness; and having received it and paid him, I hastened to my master to get him to sign it, that I might be fully released. Accordingly he signed the manumission that day, so that, before night, I who had been a slave in the morning, trembling at the will of another, was become my own master, and completely free. I thought this was the happiest day I had ever experienced; and my joy was still heightened by the blessings and prayers of the sable race, particularly the aged, to whom my heart had ever been attached with reverence.

As the form of my manumission has something peculiar in it, and expresses the absolute power and dominion one man claims over his fellow, I shall beg leave to present it before my readers at full length:

Montserrat.—To all men unto whom these presents shall come: I Robert King, of the parish of St. Anthony in the said island, merchant, send greeting: Know ye, that I the aforesaid Robert King, for and in consideration of the sum of seventy pounds current money of the said island,<sup>9</sup> to me in hand paid, and to the intent that a negro man-slave, named Gustavus Vassa, shall and may become free, have manumitted, emancipated, enfranchised, and set free, and by these presents do manumit, emancipate, enfranchise, and set free, the aforesaid negro man-slave, named Gustavus Vassa, for ever, hereby giving, granting, and releasing unto him, the said Gustavus Vassa, all right, title, dominion, sovereignty, and property, which, as lord and master over the aforesaid Gustavus Vassa, I had, or now I have, or by any means whatsoever I may or can hereafter possibly have over him the aforesaid negro, for ever. In witness whereof I the above-said Robert King have unto these presents set my hand and seal, this tenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six.

ROBERT KING

Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of Terrylegay, Montserrat.

Registered the within manumission at full length, this eleventh day of July, 1766, in liber D.<sup>1</sup>

TERRYLEGAY, REGISTER.

In short, the fair as well as black people immediately styled me by a new appellation, to me the most desirable in the world, which was Freeman, and at the dances I gave my Georgia superfine blue clothes made no indifferent appearance, as I thought.

1700-1748

James Thomson, the first and most popular nature poet of the century, did not see London until he was twenty-five years old. He grew up in the picturesque border country of Roxboroughshire in Scotland and, after studying divinity in Edinburgh, went to London in 1725, bringing with him, in addition to a memory well stored with images of the external world, the earliest version of his descriptive poem "Winter" in 405 lines of blank verse. Published in 1726, it soon became popular. Thomson went on to publish "Summer" (1727), "Spring" (1728), and "Autumn" in the first collected edition of The Seasons (1730), to which he added the "Hymn to the Seasons." During the next sixteen years, because of constant revisions and additions, the poem grew in length to 5,541 lines. The Seasons continued to be popular well into the Romantic period; between 1730 and 1800 it was printed fifty times. Thomson's last poem, The Castle of Indolence (1748), is a witty imitation of Spenser; it moves from a playful portrait of the idleness of the poet and his friends to a celebration of industry and progress. (For more poems by Thomson and more selections from The Seasons, go to Norton Literature Online.)

The Seasons set the fashion for the poetry of natural description. Generations of readers learned to look at the external world through Thomson's eyes and with the emotions that he had taught them to feel. The eye dominates the literature of external nature during the eighteenth century as the imagination was to do in the poetry of William Wordsworth. And Thomson amazed his readers by his capacity to see: the general effects of light and cloud and foliage or the particular image of a leaf tossed in the gale or the slender feet of a robin or the delicate film of ice at the edge of a brook. He tries to view each season from every perspective, as it might be perceived by a bird in the sky or by the tiniest insect, by God or a painter or Milton or Sir Isaac Newton (whom Thomson commemorated in a popular ode). As the poem grew, it became an omnium gatherum of contemporary ideas and interests: natural history; ideas about the nature of man and society, primitive and civilized; the conception of created nature as a source of religious experience, as an object of religious veneration, and as a continuing revelation of a Creator whose presence fills the world.

[EVENING AND NIGHT]<sup>1</sup>

The western sun withdraws the shortened day;
 And humid evening, gliding o'er the sky,
 In her chill progress, to the ground condensed io85 The vapors throws. Where creeping waters ooze,
 Where marshes stagnate, and where rivers wind,
 Cluster the rolling fogs, and swim along
 The dusky-mantled lawn. Meanwhile the moon,
 Full-orbed and breaking through the scattered clouds,
 1090 Shows her broad visage in the crimsoned east.

1. This passage, like many in The Seasons, went through extensive revisions. The opening lines on the harvest moon shining through fog (1082—1102) originally belonged to "Winter"; the descriptions of the aurora borealis (1108—37) and wildfire

(1150—64) first appeared in "Summer." Scientific and visionary, divine and human perspectives are contrasted and join together in an intricate harmony.

Turned to the sun direct, her spotted disk

 And caverns deep, as optic tube<sup>0</sup> descries) telescope
 A smaller earth, gives all his blaze again,

 Now through the passing cloud she seems to stoop,
 Now up the pure cerulean rides sublime.
 Wide the pale deluge<sup>0</sup> floats, and streaming mild moonlight
 O'er the skied<sup>3</sup> mountain to the shadowy vale, 110 While rocks and floods reflect the quivering gleam,
 The whole air whitens with a boundless tide
 Of silver radiance trembling round the world.
 But when, half blotted from the sky, her light
 Fainting, permits the starry fires to burn

 Or quite extinct her deadened orb appears,
 And scarce appears, of sickly beamless white;
 Oft in this season, silent from the north
 A blaze of meteors<sup>4</sup> shoots—ensweeping first

 High to the crown<sup>5</sup> of heaven, and, all at once
 Relapsing quick, as quickly reascend,
 And mix and thwart,<sup>0</sup> extinguish and renew, cross
 All ether coursing<sup>6</sup> in a maze of light,

 Thronged with aerial spears and steeds of fire;
 Till, the long lines of full-extended war

 Rolls a broad slaughter o'er the plains of heaven.
 As thus they scan the visionary scene,
 On all sides swells the superstitious din,
 Incontinent; and busy frenzy talks
 U25 Of blood and battle; cities overturned,
 And late at night in swallowing earthquake sunk,
 Or hideous wrapped in fierce ascending flame;
 Of sallow famine, inundation, storm;
 Of pestilence, and every great distress;

2. Observation of the moon had revealed shadows ("umbrageous dales"), hence an irregular surface.

3. I.e., seeming to touch the sky.

4. Not meteors as we think of them, but the aurora borealis, or northern lights (multicolored, streaming pulses of light in the upper atmosphere). The aurora had often been associated with cosmic battles, in both literature and popular superstition.

5. The corona or central ring of the aurora.

6. Running through all the upper sky.

 Order confounded lies, all beauty void,
 Distinction lost, and gay variety
 One universal blot—such the fair power
 Of light to kindle and create the whole.

 Who then bewildered wanders through the dark
 Full of pale fancies and chimeras<sup>0</sup> huge; imaginary monsters

 From cottage streaming or from airy hall.
 150 Perhaps, impatient as he stumbles on,
 Struck from the root of slimy rushes, blue
 The wildfire<sup>8</sup> scatters round, or, gathered, trails
 A length of flame deceitful o'er the moss;
 Whither decoyed by the fantastic blaze,
 155 Now lost and now renewed, he sinks absorbed,
 Rider and horse, amid the miry gulf—
 While still, from day to day, his pining wife
 And plaintive children his return await,
 In wild conjecture lost. At other times, ii60 Sent by the better genius of the night,
 Innocuous,<sup>0</sup> gleaming on the horse's mane, harmless
 The meteor<sup>9</sup> sits, and shows the narrow path
 That winding leads through pits of death, or else
 Instructs him how to take the dangerous ford.
 H65 The lengthened night elapsed, the morning shines
 Serene, in all her dewy beauty bright,
 Unfolding fair the last autumnal day.
 And now the mounting sun dispels the fog;
 The rigid hoarfrost melts before his beam;
 170 And, hung on every spray, on every blade
 Of grass, the myriad dewdrops twinkle round.

8. Will-o'-the-wisp or ignis fatuus, a flitting phosphorescent light thought to kindle from the gas of decaying swamp grasses ("slimy rushes").

9. The ignis lambens, or St. Elmo's fire, a halo of light that shines on the tips of certain objects during electrical storms.

THOMAS GRAY

1716-1771

The man who wrote the English poem most loved by those whom Samuel Johnson called "the common reader" was a scholarly recluse who lived the quiet life of a university professor in the stagnant atmosphere of mid-eighteenth-century Cambridge. Born in London, Thomas Gray was the only one of twelve children to survive, and his family life was desperately unhappy. At eight he left home for Eton, where he made intimate friends: Richard West, a fellow poet; Thomas Ashton; and Horace

Walpole, the son of the prime minister. After four years at Cambridge, Gray left without a degree to take the grand tour of France and Italy as Walpole's guest. The death of West in 1742 desolated Gray, and memories of West haunt much of his verse. He spent the rest of his life in Cambridge, pursuing his studies and writing wonderful letters as well as a handful of poems. Two high-flown Pindaric odes, "The Progress of Poesy" (1754) and "The Bard" (1757), display his learning and his love of nature and the sublime. (For more poems by Gray, go to Norton Literature Online.)

Most of Gray's poems take part in a contemporary reaction against the wit and satiric elegance of Pope's couplets; poets sought a new style, at once intimate and prophetic. Gray was not easily satisfied; he constantly revised his poems and published very little. Because he held that "the language of the age is never the language of poetry," he often uses archaic words and a word order borrowed from Latin, where a verb can precede its subject (as in line 35 of the "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard": "Awaits alike the inevitable hour"). But the "Elegy" stands alone in his work. It balances Latinate phrases with living English speech, and the learning of a scholar with a common humanity that everyone can share. Johnson, who did not usually like Gray's poetry, acknowledged that the "Elegy" would live on:

The Churchyard abounds with images that find a mirror in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo. The four stanzas beginning "Yet even these bones" are to me original: I have never seen the notions in any other place; yet he that reads them here, persuades himself that he has always felt them. Had Gray written often thus, it had been vain to blame, and useless to praise him.

Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College

Anthropos ikane prophasis eis to dustukheln.<sup>1</sup>

MENANDER

Ye distant spires, ye antique towers,
 That crown the watery glade,
 Where grateful Science<sup>0</sup> still adores Learning
 Her Henry's holy shade;<sup>2</sup>
 5 And ye, that from the stately brow
 Of Windsor's heights<sup>3</sup> the expanse below
 Of grove, of lawn, of mead survey,
 Whose turf, whose shade, whose flowers among Wanders the hoary Thames along
 10 His silver-winding way.

Ah happy hills, ah pleasing shade,
 Ah fields beloved in vain,
 Where once my careless childhood strayed,
 A stranger yet to pain!
 15 I feel the gales, that from ye blow,
 A momentary bliss bestow,
 As waving fresh their gladsome wing,
 My weary soul they seem to soothe,

1. I am a man: sufficient reason for being miserable (Greek).

2. Henry VI founded Eton in 1440.

3. Windsor Castle, across the Thames valley from Eton.

And, redolent of joy and youth,
20 To breathe a second spring.

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent<sup>0</sup> green bank
The paths of pleasure trace,
25 Who foremost now delight to cleave
With pliant arm thy glassy wave?
The captive linnet which enthrall?<sup>0</sup> imprison
What idle progeny succeed<sup>4</sup>
To chase the rolling circle's<sup>0</sup> speed, hoop's
30 Or urge the flying ball?

While some on earnest business bent
Their murmuring labors' ply
'Gainst graver hours, that bring constraint
To sweeten liberty:
35 Some bold adventurers disdain
The limits of their little reign,
And unknown regions dare descry:
Still as they run they look behind,
They hear a voice in every wind,
40 And snatch a fearful joy.

Gay hope is theirs by fancy fed,
Less pleasing when possessed;
The tear forgot as soon as shed,
The sunshine of the breast:
45 Theirs buxom<sup>0</sup> health of rosy hue, zestful, jolly
Wild wit, invention ever new,
And lively cheer of vigor born;
The thoughtless day, the easy night,
The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
50 That fly the approach of morn.

Alas, regardless of their doom,
The little victims play!
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond today.
55 Yet see how all around 'em wait
The ministers of human fate,
And black Misfortune's baleful train!
Ah, show them where in ambush stand
To seize their prey the murderous band!
60 Ah, tell them they are men!

These shall the fury Passions tear,
The vultures of the mind,
Disdainful Anger, pallid Fear,
And Shame that skulks behind;

4. I.e., follow in succession Gray's generation.

5. Recited lessons for school.

65 Or pining Love shall waste their youth,
 Or Jealousy with rankling tooth,
     That inly gnaws the secret heart,
 And Envy wan, and faded Care,
 Grim-visaged comfortless Despair,
 70 And Sorrow's piercing dart.

Ambition this shall tempt to rise,
     Then whirl the wretch from high,
 To bitter Scorn a sacrifice,
     And grinning Infamy.
 75 The stings of Falsehood those shall try,
 And hard Unkindness' altered eye,
     That mocks the tear it forced to flow;
 And keen Remorse with blood defiled,
 And moody Madness laughing wild
 80 Amid severest woe.

Lo, in the vale of years beneath
     A grisly troop are seen,
 The painful family of Death,
     More hideous than their queen:
 85 This racks the joints, this fires the veins,
 That every laboring sinew strains,
     Those in the deeper vitals rage:
 Lo, Poverty, to fill the band,
 That numbs the soul with icy hand,
 90 And slow-consuming Age.

To each his sufferings: all are men,
     Condemned alike to groan;
 The tender for another's pain,
     The unfeeling for his own.
 95 Yet ah! why should they know their fate?
 Since sorrow never comes too late,
     And happiness too swiftly flies.
 Thought would destroy their paradise.
 No more; where ignorance is bliss,
 100 'Tis folly to be wise.

Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat<sup>1</sup>

Drowned in a Tub of Goldfishes

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
 Where China's gayest art had dyed
 The azure flowers that blow;<sup>o</sup>

bloom

1. Selima, one of Horace Walpole's cats, had recently drowned in a china cistern. Gray wrote this memorial at Walpole's request. For an illustration of this poem by William Blake, see the color insert in this volume.

Demurest of the tabby kind,
 5 The pensive Selima reclined,
 Gazed on the lake below.

Her conscious tail her joy declared;
 The fair round face, the snowy beard,
 The velvet of her paws,
 10 Her coat, that with the tortoise vies,
 Her ears of jet, and emerald eyes,
 She saw; and purred applause.

Still had she gazed; but 'midst the tide
 Two angel forms were seen to glide, is The genii of the stream:
 Their scaly armor's Tyrian<sup>0</sup> hue purple
 Through richest purple to the view
 Betrayed a golden gleam.

The hapless nymph with wonder saw:
 20 A whisker first and then a claw,
 With many an ardent wish,
 She stretched in vain to reach the prize.
 What female heart can gold despise?
 What cat's averse to fish?

Presumptuous maid! with looks intent
 25 Again she stretched, again she bent,
 Nor knew the gulf between.
 (Malignant Fate sat by and smiled)
 The slippery verge her feet beguiled,
 30 She tumbled headlong in.

Eight times emerging from the flood
 She mewed to every watery god,
 Some speedy aid to send.
 No dolphin came, no nereid<sup>0</sup> stirred: sea nymph
 35 Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan<sup>2</sup> heard.
 A favorite has no friend!

From hence, ye beauties, undeceived,
 Know, one false step is ne'er retrieved,
 And be with caution bold.
 40 Not all that tempts your wandering eyes
 And heedless hearts is lawful prize;
 Nor all that glisters gold.

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard

The curfew<sup>1</sup> tolls the knell of parting day,
 The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
 The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
 And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

5 Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
 And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
 Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
 And drowsy tindrings lull the distant folds;

10 Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
 The moping owl does to the moon complain
 Of such, as wandering near her secret bower,
 Molest her ancient solitary reign.

Beneath those rugged elms, that yew tree's shade,
 Where heaves the turf in many a moldering heap,
 15 Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
 The rude<sup>o</sup> forefathers of the hamlet sleep. uneducated

The breezy call of incense-breathing Morn,
 The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed,
 The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,<sup>o</sup> hunter's horn
 20 No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
 Or busy housewife ply her evening care;
 No children run to lisp their sire's return,
 Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

25 Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
 Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe<sup>o</sup> has broke; soil
 How jocund did they drive their team afield!
 How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

30 Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
 Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;
 Nor Grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
 The short and simple annals of the poor.

The boast of heraldry," the pomp of power, noble birth
 And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave, 35 Awaits alike the inevitable hour.
 The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,
 If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies<sup>2</sup> raise,

1. A bell rung in the evening.

2. An ornamental or symbolic group of figures depicting the achievements of the deceased.

- Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted<sup>3</sup> vault 40 The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.
- Can storied urn<sup>4</sup> or animated<sup>0</sup> bust lifelite
 Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
 Can Honor's voice provoke<sup>0</sup> the silent dust, call forth
 Or Flattery soothe the dull cold ear of Death?
- 45 Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
 Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
 Hands that the rod of empire might have swayed,<sup>0</sup> wielded
 Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.
- But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
 50 Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
 Chill Penury repressed their noble rage,<sup>0</sup> inspiration
 And froze the genial<sup>0</sup> current of the soul. creative
- Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
 The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
 55 Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
 And waste its sweetness on the desert air.
- Some village Hampden,<sup>5</sup> that with dauntless breast
 The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
 Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
 60 Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood.
- The applause of listening senates to command,
 The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
 To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
 And read their history in a nation's eyes,
- 65 Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone
 Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
 Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
 And shut the gates of mercy on mankind,
- The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
 70 To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
 Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
 With incense kindled at the Muse's flame.
- Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
 Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
 75 Along the cool sequestered vale of life
 They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

3. Decorated with intersecting lines in relief.

4. A funeral urn with an epitaph or pictured story inscribed on it.

5. John Hampden (1594-1643), who, both as a private citizen and as a member of Parliament, zealously defended the rights of the people against the autocratic policies of Charles I.

Yet even these bones from insult to protect
 Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
 With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture decked,<sup>6</sup>
 50 Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

Their name, their years, spelt by the unlettered Muse,
 The place of fame and elegy supply:
 And many a holy text around she strews,
 That teach the rustic moralist to die.

85 For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey,
 This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
 Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
 Nor cast one longing lingering look behind?

On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
 90 Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
 Even from the tomb the voice of Nature cries,
 Even in our ashes live their wonted fires.

For thee, who mindful of the unhonored dead
 Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
 95 If chance,<sup>o</sup> by lonely contemplation led,
 Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate,

perchance

Haply some hoary-headed swain may say,
 "Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
 Brushing with hasty steps the dews away
 100 To meet the sun upon the upland lawn.

"There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
 That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
 His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
 And pore upon the brook that babbles by.

105 "Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn,
 Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
 Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
 Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.

"One morn I missed him on the customed hill,
 110 Along the heath and near his favorite tree;
 Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
 Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

"The next with dirges due in sad array
 Slow through the churchway path we saw him borne.
 115 Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay,
 Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn."

6. Cf. "the storied urn or animated bust" dedicated inside the church to "the proud" (line 41).

The Epitaph

Here rests his head upon the lap of Earth
 A youth to Fortune and to Fame unknown.
 Fair Science<sup>o</sup> frowned not on his humble birth,
 120 And Melancholy marked him for her own. Learning

Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere,
 Heaven did a recompense as largely send:
 He gave to Misery all he had, a tear,
 He gained from Heaven ('twas all he wished) a friend.

125 No farther seek his merits to disclose,
 Or draw his frailties from their dread abode
 (There they alike in trembling hope repose),
 The bosom of his Father and his God.

WILLIAM COLLINS
1721-1759

William Collins was born in Chichester and was educated at Winchester and Oxford. Coming up to London from the university, he tried to establish himself as an author, but he was given rather to planning than to writing books. He came to know Samuel Johnson, who later remembered him affectionately as a man of learning who "loved fairies, genii, giants, and monsters" and who "delighted to rove through the meanders of enchantment." In 1746 Collins published his Odes on Several Descriptive and Allegorical Subjects, his part in an undertaking, with his friend Joseph Warton, to create a new poetry, more lyrical and fanciful than that of Alexander Pope's generation. Collins's Odes address personified abstractions (Fear, Pity, the Passions), which are imagined as vivid presences that overwhelm the poet as he calls them to life. In form these poems represent a new version of the Great or Cowleian Ode (see headnote to Ben Jonson's "Cary-Morison ode," p. 1439); Collins returns to Pindar's regularity of structure. But the originality of the Odes lies in their intensity of vision, which risks obscurity in quest of the sublime. (For more poems by Collins, go to Norton Literature Online.)

To his disappointment, contemporaries preferred his early Persian Eclogues to the more difficult Odes. Inheriting some money, the poet traveled for a while, but fits of depression gradually deepened into total debility. He spent his last years in Chichester, forgotten by all but a small circle of loyal friends. As the century progressed he gained in reputation. The Romantics admired his poems and felt akin to him. Coleridge said that "Ode on the Poetical Character" "has inspired and whirled me along with greater agitations of enthusiasm than any the most impassioned scene in Schiller or Shakespeare."

Ode on the Poetical Character This ode, long disregarded, has lately been acclaimed by critics as an early, dramatic engagement with one of the central concerns of the Romantic age—the origin and role of the creative imagination and, indeed, of the poet himself.

In the strophe an analogy is drawn between the magic girdle of Venus, which only the chaste can wear, and the cest, or girdle, of Fancy, or the creative imagination. In the epode the creation of the world is presented as an act of the divine imagination. Inspired by God, Fancy gives birth to another sublime creation, the spirit of poetry.

In the antistrophe, John Milton is regarded as the type of poet divinely able to wear the girdle of Fancy. Collins pictures himself pursuing the "guiding steps" (line 71) of Milton, as of Edmund Spenser (in the strophe)—both poet-prophets. His movement away from the elegant school of Edmund Waller (and, by implication, that of Alexander Pope) is "In vain" (line 72), however, for he lives in an uninspired age.

Ode on the Poetical Character

Strophe

As once, if not with light regard,
 I read aright that gifted bard
 (Him<sup>1</sup> whose school above the rest
 His loveliest Elfin Queen has blest),
 5 One, only one, unrivaled fair
 Might hope the magic girdle wear,
 At solemn tourney hung on high,
 The wish of each love-darting eye;<sup>2</sup>
 Lo! to each other nymph in turn applied,
 10 As if, in air unseen, some hovering hand,
 Some chaste and angel-friend to virgin-fame,
 With whispered spell had burst the starting band,
 It left unblest her loathed dishonored side;
 Happier, hopeless fair, if never 15 Her baffled hand with vain endeavor
 Had touched that fatal zone<sup>0</sup> to her denied! girdle
 Young Fancy thus, to me divinest name,
 To whom, prepared and bathed in Heaven
 The cest<sup>o</sup> of amplest power is given: girdle
 20 To few the godlike gift assigns,
 To gird their blest, prophetic loins,<sup>3</sup>
 And gaze her visions wild, and feel unmixed her flame!

Epode

The band, as fairy legends say,
 Was wove on that creating day,
 25 When He,<sup>4</sup> who called with thought to birth
 Yon tented sky, this laughing earth,
 And dressed with springs, and forests tall,
 And poured the main engirthing all,
 Long by the loved Enthusiast<sup>5</sup> wooed,

1. Edmund Spenser.

2. The Faerie Queene 4.5 tells of the contest of many beautiful ladies for the girdle of Venus.

3. Pronounced lines.

4. God, on the day of creation.

5. I.e., Fancy; literally, "enthusiast" means "one possessed by a god."

Himself in some diviner mood,
 Retiring, sate with her alone,
 And placed her on his sapphire throne;
 The whiles, the vaulted shrine around,
 Seraphic wires were heard to sound,
 Now sublimest triumph swelling,
 Now on love and mercy dwelling;
 And she, from out the veiling cloud,
 Breathed her magic notes aloud:
 And thou, thou rich-haired Youth of Morn,<sup>6</sup>
 And all thy subject life was born!
 The dangerous Passions kept aloof,
 Far from the sainted growing woof:
 But near it sate ecstatic Wonder,
 Listening the deep applauding thunder:
 And Truth, in sunny vest arrayed,
 By whose the tarsel's<sup>9</sup> eyes were made;
 All the shadowy tribes of Mind,
 In braided dance their murmurs joined,
 And all the bright uncounted Powers
 Who feed on Heaven's ambrosial flowers.
 Where is the bard, whose soul can now
 Its high presuming hopes avow?
 Where he who thinks, with rapture blind,
 This hallow'd work<sup>7</sup> for him designed?

falcon's

Antistrophe

High on some cliff, to Heaven up-piled,
 Of rude access, of prospect wild,
 Where, tangled round the jealous<sup>9</sup> steep,
 Strange shades o'erbrow the valleys deep,
 And holy Genii guard the rock,
 Its glooms embrown, its springs unlock,
 While on its rich ambitious head,
 An Eden, like his<sup>9</sup> own, lies spread:
 I view that oak, the fancied glades among,
 By which as Milton lay, his evening ear,
 From many a cloud that dropped ethereal dew,
 Nigh sphered in Heaven its native strains could hear:
 On which that ancient trump he reached was hung;
 Thither oft, his glory greeting,
 From Waller's<sup>8</sup> myrtle shades retreating,
 With many a vow from Hope's aspiring tongue,
 My trembling feet his guiding steps pursue;
 In vain—such bliss to one alone,<sup>9</sup>
 Of all the sons of soul was known,

Milton's

Milton

6. Apollo, god of the sun and of poetry, associated with the archetypal poet.

7. The girdle of Fancy.

8. Edmund Waller (1606-1687). The myrtle is the symbol of love poetry; Waller's poetry is thought of as trivial compared with Milton's grandeur.

75 And Heaven, and Fancy, kindred powers,
 Have now o'erturned the inspiring bowers,
 Or curtained close such scene from every future view.

Ode to Evening<sup>1</sup>

If aught of oaten stop,<sup>2</sup> or pastoral song,
 May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest ear,
 Like thy own solemn springs,
 Thy springs and dying gales,
 5 O nymph reserved, while now the bright-haired sun
 Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
 With brede<sup>o</sup> ethereal wove, embroider}<sup>3</sup>
 O'erhang his wavy bed:
 Now air is hushed, save where the weak-eyed bat,
 10 With short shrill shriek flits by on leathern wing,
 Or where the beetle winds
 His small but sullen horn,
 As oft he rises 'midst the twilight path,
 Against the pilgrim borne in heedless hum:
 15 Now teach me, maid composed,
 To breathe some softened strain,
 Whose numbers," stealing through thy darkening vale, measures
 May not unseemly with its stillness suit,
 As, musing slow, I hail 20 Thy genial<sup>o</sup> loved return! life-giving
 For when thy folding-star<sup>3</sup> arising shows
 His paly cirlet, at his warning lamp
 The fragrant Hours, and elves
 Who slept in flowers the day,
 25 And many a nymph who wreaths her brows with sedge,
 And sheds the freshening dew, and, lovelier still,
 The pensive Pleasures sweet,
 Prepare thy shadowy car.
 Then lead, calm vot'ress, where some sheety lake
 30 Cheers the lone heath, or some time-hallowed pile
 Or upland fallows gray
 Reflect its last cool gleam.
 But when chill blustering winds, or driving rain,
 Forbid my willing feet, be mine the hut
 35 That from the mountain's side
 Views wilds, and swelling floods,
 And hamlets brown, and dim-discovered spires,
 And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all
 Thy dewy fingers draw

1. Collins borrowed the metrical structure and the rhymeless lines of this ode from Milton's translation of Horace. Odes 1.5 (1673). The text printed here is based on the revised version, published in Dodsley's Miscellany (1748).

2. Finger hole in a shepherd's flute.

3. The evening star, which signals the hour for herding the sheep into the sheepfold.

- 40 The gradual dusky veil.
 While Spring shall pour his showers, as oft he wont,
 And bathe thy breathing tresses, meekest Eve;
     While Summer loves to sport
     Beneath thy lingering light;
- 45 While fallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves;
 Or Winter, yelling through the troublous air,
     Affrights thy shrinking train,
     And rudely rends thy robes;
 So long, sure-found beneath the sylvan shed,
- 50 Shall Fancy, Friendship, Science, rose-lipped Health,
 Thy gentlest influence own,
 And hymn thy favorite name!

CHRISTOPHER SMART

1722-1771

In 1756 Christopher Smart, who had won prizes at Pembroke College, Cambridge, as a scholar and poet and was known in London as a wit and bon vivant, was seized by religious mania: "a preternatural excitement to prayer," according to Hester Thrale, "which he held it as a duty not to control or repress." If Smart had been content to pray in private, his life might have ended as happily as it began, but he insisted on kneeling down in the streets, in parks, and in assembly rooms. He became a public nuisance, and the public took its revenge. For most of the next seven years Smart was confined, first in St. Luke's hospital, then in a private madhouse. There, severed from his wife, his children, and his friends, he began to write a bold new sort of poetry: vivid, concise, abrupt, syntactically daring. Few of his contemporaries noticed it. After Smart's release from the madhouse (1763) he fell into debt—he had always been profligate—and his masterpiece, A Song to David (1763), was almost completely ignored (for the complete text of A Song to David, go to Norton Literature Online). He died, forgotten, in a debtor's prison. But in the nineteenth century his reputation revived, and since the publication of Jubilate Agno in 1939 his poems have become newly famous.

Jubilate Agno (Rejoice in the Lamb), written a few lines at a time during Smart's confinement, is (1) a record of his daily life and thoughts; (2) the notebook of a scholar, crammed with puns and obscure learning, which sets out elaborate correspondences between the world of the Bible and modern England; and (3) a personal testament or book of worship, antiphonally arranged in lines beginning alternately with Let and For, which seeks to join the material and spiritual universes in one unending prayer. It has also come to be recognized, since first published in 1939 by W. F. Stead, as a poem—a poem unique in English for its ecstatic sense of the presence of the divine spirit. The most famous passage describes Smart's cat, Jeffry, his only companion during the years of confinement: "For I am possessed of a cat, surpassing in beauty, from whom I take occasion to bless Almighty God." At once a real cat, lovingly observed in all its frisks, and visible evidence of the providential plan, Jeffry celebrates the Maker, as all things do, in his very being.

From Jubilate Agno

[MY CAT JEOFFRY]

- For I will consider my Cat Jeoffry.
 For he is the servant of the Living God duly and daily serving him.
 For at the first glance of the glory of God in the East° he sunrise worships in his way.
 For is this done by wreathing his body seven times round with elegant quickness.
- 5 For then he leaps up to catch the musk, w^ is the blessing of God upon his prayer.
 For he rolls upon prank<sup>0</sup> to work it in. pranhishly
 For having done duty and received blessing he begins to consider himself.
 For this he performs in ten degrees.
 For first he looks upon his fore-paws to see if they are clean.
- 10 For secondly he kicks up behind to clear away there.
 For thirdly he works it upon stretch with the fore-paws extended.
 For fourthly he sharpens his paws by wood.
 For fifthly he washes himself.
 For Sixthly he rolls upon wash.
- 15 For Seventhly he fleas himself, that he may not be interrupted upon the beat.
 For Eighthly he rubs himself against a post.
 For Ninthly he looks up for his instructions.
 For Tenthly he goes in quest of food.
 For having consider'd God and himself he will consider his neighbor.
- 20 For if he meets another cat he will kiss her in kindness.
 For when he takes his prey he plays with it to give it a chance.
 For one mouse in seven escapes by his dallying.
 For when his day's work is done his business more properly begins.
 For he keeps the Lord's watch in the night against the adversary.
- 25 For he counteracts the powers of darkness by his electrical skin & glaring eyes.
 For he counteracts the Devil, who is death, by brisking about the life.
 For in his morning orisons he loves the sun and the sun loves him.
 For he is of the tribe of Tiger.
 For the Cherub Cat is a term of the Angel Tiger.<sup>1</sup>
- 30 For he has the subtlety and hissing of a serpent, which in goodness he suppresses.
 For he will not do destruction if he is well-fed, neither will he spit without provocation.
 For he purrs in thankfulness, when God tells him he's a good Cat.
 For he is an instrument for the children to learn benevolence upon.
 For every house is incomplete without him & a blessing is lacking in the spirit.
- 35 For the Lord commanded Moses concerning the cats at the departure of the Children of Israel from Egypt.<sup>2</sup>
 For every family had one cat at least in the bag.

1. As a cherub is a small angel, so a cat is a small tiger.      2. No cats are mentioned in the Bible.

- For the English Cats are the best in Europe.
 For he is the cleanest in the use of his fore-paws of any quadrupede.
 For the dexterity of his defence is an instance of the love of God to him exceedingly.
- 40 For he is the quickest to his mark of any creature.
 For he is tenacious of his point.
 For he is a mixture of gravity and waggery.
 For he knows that God is his Saviour.
 For there is nothing sweeter than his peace when at rest.
- 45 For there is nothing brisker than his life when in motion.
 For he is of the Lord's poor and so indeed is he called by benevolence perpetually—Poor Jeoffry! poor Jeoffry! the rat has bit thy throat.
 For I bless the name of the Lord Jesus that Jeoffry is better.
 For the divine spirit comes about his body to sustain it in compleat cat.
 For his tongue is exceeding pure so that it has in purity what it wants in music.
- 50 For he is docile and can learn certain things.
 For he can set up with gravity which is patience upon approbation.
 For he can fetch and carry, which is patience in employment.
 For he can jump over a stick which is patience upon proof positive.
 For he can spraggle upon waggle' at the word of command.
- 55 For he can jump from an eminence into his master's bosom.
 For he can catch the cork and toss it again.
 For he is hated by the hypocrite and miser.
 For the former is afraid of detection.
 For the latter refuses the charge.
- 60 For he camels his back to bear the first notion of business.
 For he is good to think on, if a man would express himself neatly.
 For he made a great figure in Egypt for his signal services.
 For he killed the Ichneumon-rat very pernicious by land.<sup>4</sup>
 For his ears are so acute that they sting again.
- 65 For from this proceeds the passing<sup>0</sup> quickness of his surpassing attention.
 For by stroking of him I have found out electricity.
 For I perceived God's light about him both wax and fire.
 For the Electrical fire is the spiritual substance, which God sends from heaven to sustain the bodies both of man and beast.
 For God has blessed him in the variety of his movements.
- 70 For, though he cannot fly, he is an excellent clamberer.
 For his motions upon the face of the earth are more than any other quadrupede.
 For he can tread to all the measures upon the music.
 For he can swim for life.
 For he can creep.

3. He can sprawl when his master waggles a finger or stick.

4. The ichneumon, which resembles a weasel, was venerated and domesticated by the ancient Egyptians.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH
ca. 1730-1774

Oliver Goldsmith was born in Ireland, the son of an Anglican clergyman whose geniality he inherited and whose improvidence he imitated. Disfigured by smallpox, he grew up homely, ungainly, apparently stupid, and certainly idle. Nonetheless, he was sent to Trinity College, Dublin, as a sizar—i.e., a student who did menial jobs for well-to-do undergraduates—and took his A.B. in 1749. After studying medicine at the University of Edinburgh he wandered for a while on the Continent, visiting Holland, France, Italy, and Switzerland. He returned to England in 1756 with a mysteriously acquired M.D. and tried in vain to support himself as a physician among the poor in the borough of Southwark. Eventually he drifted into the profession of hack writer for Ralph Griffiths, the proprietor of the Monthly Review, and later worked for and with the benevolent publisher John Newbery. His first success, An Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe (1759), attributes the decline of the fine arts in mid-eighteenth-century Europe to the lack of enlightened patronage and to the malign influence of criticism and scholarship. Soon he became a famous author and an intimate of the brilliant circle around Samuel Johnson. Although his writings brought in a great deal of money, extravagance and generosity kept him always in debt. He died owing the prodigious sum (for a man whose only source of income was writing) of £2000. (For a sample of Goldsmith's writing for periodicals, go to Norton Literature Online.)

The variety and excellence of Goldsmith's work are astonishing. His easy and pleasant prose style and shrewd observations of character and scene enliven his essays, especially those in the series The Citizen of the World (1762), and his popular novel The Vicar of Wakefield (1766). Two plays, The Good-Natured Man (1768) and She Stoops to Conquer (1773), achieve a sort of hearty and mirthful comedy—unspoiled by the fashionable sentimentality of the moment—that is unique in the century. His two major poems, The Traveler, or A Prospect of Society (1764) and The Deserted Village, are distinguished for the unforced grace of their couplets and for an air of simplicity that is far from simple to achieve.

The Deserted Village<sup>1</sup>

Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain,
Where health and plenty cheered the laboring swain,
Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's lingering blooms delayed:
5 Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease,
Seats of my youth, when every sport could please,
How often have I loitered o'er thy green,

1. The Deserted Village is an idealization of English rural life mingled with poignant memories of the poet's own youth in Lissoy, Ireland. Goldsmith was seriously concerned about the effects of the agricultural revolution then in progress, which was being hastened by Enclosure Acts. Either for the sake of more profitable farming or to create vast private parks and landscape gardens, arable land was being "enclosed"—i.e., taken out of the hands of small proprietors—thus displacing yeoman farmers who, like their ancestors, had lived for generations in small villages, grazing their cattle on common land and raising food on small holdings. The only alternative available to many such people was to seek employment in the city or to migrate to America. In the poem, Goldsmith opposes "luxury" (the increase of wealth, the growth of cities, and the costly country estates of great noblemen and wealthy merchants) to "rural virtue" (the old agrarian economy that supported a sturdy population of independent peasants). His poem is thus at once a nostalgic lament for a doomed way of life and a denunciation of what he regarded as the corrupting, destructive force of new wealth.

Where humble happiness endeared each scene;
 How often have I paused on every charm,
 10 The sheltered cot,<sup>o</sup> the cultivated farm, cottage
 The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
 The decent church that topped the neighboring hill,
 The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
 For talking age and whispering lovers made;
 15 How often have I blessed the coming day,<sup>o</sup> Sunday
 When toil remitting lent its turn to play,
 And all the village train, from labor free,
 Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree,
 While many a pastime circled in the shade,
 20 The young contending as the old surveyed;
 And many a gambol frolicked o'er the ground.
 And sleights of art and feats of strength went round;
 And still as each repeated pleasure tired,
 Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspired;
 25 The dancing pair that simply sought renown,
 By holding out to tire each other down;
 The swain mistrustless of his smutted face,
 While secret laughter tittered round the place;
 The bashful virgin's sidelong looks of love,
 30 The matron's glance that would those looks reprove:
 These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like these,
 With sweet succession, taught even toil to please;
 These round thy bowers their cheerful influence shed,
 These were thy charms—But all these charms are fled.
 35 Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn,
 Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn;
 Amidst thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
 And desolation saddens all thy green:
 One only master grasps the whole domain,
 40 And half a tillage stints thy smiling plain;
 No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
 But choked with sedges, works its weedy way;
 Along thy glades, a solitary guest,
 The hollow-sounding bittern guards its nest;
 45 Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies,
 And tires their echoes with unvaried cries.
 Sunk are thy bowers, in shapeless ruin all,
 And the long grass o'ertops the moldering wall;
 And trembling, shrinking from the spoiler's hand,
 50 Far, far away thy children leave the land.
 Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
 Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
 Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
 A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
 55 But a bold peasantry, their country's pride.
 When once destroyed, can never be supplied.
 A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
 When every rood<sup>o</sup> of ground maintained its man;
 For him light labor spread her wholesome store, 60 Just gave what life required, but gave no more:

quarter acre

His best companions, innocence and health;
 And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.
 But times are altered; Trade's unfeeling train
 Usurp the land and dispossess the swain;
 65 Along the lawn, where scattered hamlets rose,
 Unwieldy wealth, and cumbrous<sup>o</sup> pomp repose; oppressive
 And every want to opulence allied,
 And every pang that folly pays to pride.
 These gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
 70 Those calm desires that asked but little room,
 Those healthful sports that graced the peaceful scene,
 Lived in each look, and brightened all the green;
 These far departing seek a kinder shore,
 And rural mirth and manners are no more.
 75 Sweet Auburn! parent of the blissful hour,
 Thy glades forlorn confess the tyrant's power.
 Here, as I take my solitary rounds,
 Amidst thy tangling walks, and ruined grounds,
 And, many a year elapsed, return to view
 80 Where once the cottage stood, the hawthorn grew,
 Remembrance wakes with all her busy train,
 Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.
 In all my wanderings round this world of care,
 In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
 85 I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
 Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
 To husband out life's taper at the close,
 And keep the flame from wasting by repose.
 I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
 90 Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill,
 Around my fire an evening group to draw,
 And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
 And, as an hare whom hounds and horns pursue,
 Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
 95 I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
 Here to return—and die at home at last.
 O blest retirement, friend to life's decline,
 Retreats from care that never must be mine,
 How happy he who crowns in shades like these,
 100 A youth of labor with an age of ease;
 Who quits a world where strong temptations try,
 And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly!
 For him no wretches, born to work and weep,
 Explore the mine, or tempt the dangerous deep;
 105 No surly porter stands in guilty state
 To spurn imploring famine from the gate;
 But on he moves to meet his latter end,
 Angels around befriending virtue's friend;
 Bends to the grave with unperceived decay,
 110 While Resignation gently slopes the way;
 And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
 His Heaven commences ere the world be passed!
 Sweet was the sound when oft at evening's close,

Up yonder hill the village murmur rose;
 There, as I passed with careless steps and slow,
 The mingling notes came softened from below;
 The swain responsive as the milkmaid sung,
 The sober herd that lowed to meet their young,
 The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
 The playful children just let loose from school;
 The watchdog's voice that bayed the whispering wind,
 And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant<sup>n</sup> mind; idle, carefree
 These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,
 And filled each pause the nightingale had made.
 But now the sounds of population fail,
 No cheerful murmurs fluctuate in the gale,
 No busy steps the grass-grown footway tread,
 For all the bloomy flush of life is fled.
 All but yon widowed, solitary thing
 That feebly bends beside the plashy<sup>o</sup> spring; boggy
 She, wretched matron, forced, in age, for bread,
 To strip the brook with mantling cresses spread,
 To pick her wintry faggot from the thorn,
 To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn;
 She only left of all the harmless train,
 The sad historian of the pensive<sup>o</sup> plain. gloomy

Near yonder copse, where once the garden smiled,
 And still where many a garden flower grows wild,
 There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
 The village preacher's modest mansion rose.
 A man he was, to all the country dear,
 And passing rich with forty pounds a year;
 Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
 Nor e'er had changed, nor wished to change his place;
 Unpracticed he to fawn, or seek for power,
 By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour;
 Far other aims his heart had learned to prize,
 More skilled to raise the wretched than to rise.
 His house was known to all the vagrant train,
 He chid their wanderings, but relieved their pain;
 The long-remembered beggar was his guest,
 Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
 The ruined spendthrift, now no longer proud,
 Claimed kindred there, and had his claims allowed;
 The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
 Sate by his fire, and talked the night away;
 Wept o'er his wounds, or tales of sorrow done,
 Shouldered his crutch, and showed how fields were won.
 Pleased with his guests, the good man learned to glow,
 And quite forgot their vices in their woe;
 Careless their merits, or their faults to scan,
 His pity gave ere charity began.

Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
 And even his failings leaned to Virtue's side;
 But in his duty prompt at every call,
 He watched and wept, he prayed and felt, for all.

And, as a bird each fond endearment tries,
 To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
 He tried each art, reprov'd each dull delay,
 170 Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.
     Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
 And sorrow, guilt, and pain, by turns dismay'd,
 The reverend champion stood. At his control,
 Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
 175 Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,
 And his last faltering accents whispered praise.
     At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
 His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
 Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
 180 And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray.
 The service past, around the pious man,
 With steady zeal each honest rustic ran;
 Even children followed with endearing wile,
 And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile.
 185 His ready smile a parent's warmth express'd,
 Their welfare pleas'd him, and their cares distress'd;
 To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,
 But all his serious thoughts had rest in Heaven.
 As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
 190 Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
 Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
 Eternal sunshine settles on its head.
     Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the way,
 With blossomed furze unprofitably gay,
 195 There, in his noisy mansion, skilled to rule,
 The village master taught his little school;
 A man severe he was, and stern to view,
 I knew him well, and every truant knew;
 Well had the boding tremblers learned to trace
 200 The day's disasters in his morning face;
 Full well they laugh'd with counterfeited glee,
 At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
 Full well the busy whisper circling round,
 Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frowned;
 205 Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught,
 The love he bore to learning was in fault;<sup>2</sup>
 The village all declared how much he knew;
 'Twas certain he could write, and cipher too;
 Lands he could measure, terms and tides<sup>3</sup> presage,
 210 And even the story ran that he could gauge.<sup>4</sup>
 In arguing too, the parson own'd his skill,
 For even though vanquish'd, he could argue still;
 While words of learned length, and thundering sound,
 Amaz'd the gazing rustics ranged around;
 215 And still they gaz'd, and still the wonder grew,

2. Because the l was silent, fault and aught rhymed perfectly.

3. Feasts and seasons in the church year. "Terms":

dates on which rent, wages, etc. were due and tenancy began or ended.

4. Measure the content of casks and other vessels.

That one small head could carry all he knew.
 But past is all his fame. The very spot
 Where many a time he triumphed, is forgot.
 Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on high,
 220 Where once the signpost caught the passing eye,
 Low lies that house where nut-brown draughts inspired,
 Where graybeard Mirth and smiling Toil retired,
 Where village statesmen talked with looks profound,
 And news much older than their ale went round.
 225 Imagination fondly stoops to trace
 The parlor splendors of that festive place:
 The whitewashed wall, the nicely sanded floor,
 The varnished clock that clicked behind the door;
 The chest contrived a double debt to pay,
 230 A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day;
 The pictures placed for ornament and use,
 The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose;<sup>5</sup>
 The hearth, except when winter chilled the day,
 With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay,
 235 While broken teacups, wisely kept for show,
 Ranged o'er the chimney, glistened in a row.
 Vain transitory splendors! Could not all
 Relieve the tottering mansion from its fall!
 Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart
 240 An hour's importance to the poor man's heart;
 Thither no more the peasant shall repair
 To sweet oblivion of his daily care;
 No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale,
 No more the woodman's ballad shall prevail;
 245 No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
 Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear;
 The host himself no longer shall be found
 Careful to see the mantling bliss<sup>6</sup> go round;
 Nor the coy maid, half willing to be pressed,
 250 Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest.
 Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain,
 These simple blessings of the lowly train,
 To me more dear, congenial to my heart,
 One native charm, than all the gloss of art;
 255 Spontaneous joys, where nature has its play,
 The soul adopts, and owns their first-born sway;
 Lightly they frolic o'er the vacant mind,
 Unenvied, unmolested, unconfined.
 But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
 260 With all the freaks of wanton wealth arrayed,
 In these, ere triflers half their wish obtain,
 The toiling pleasure sickens into pain;
 And, even while fashion's brightest arts decoy,
 The heart distrusting asks, if this be joy.

5. A game in which counters were moved on a board, according to the throw of the dice. "The twelve good rules" of conduct, attributed to

Charles I, were printed in a broadside that was often seen on the walls of taverns.
 6. Foaming bliss, i.e., foaming ale.

265 Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen, who survey
 The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
 Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
 Between a splendid and an happy land.
 Proud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore,
 270 And shouting Folly hails them from her shore;
 Hoards, even beyond the miser's wish abound,
 And rich men flock from all the world around.
 Yet count our gains. This wealth is but a name
 That leaves our useful products still the same.
 275 Not so the loss. The man of wealth and pride
 Takes up a space that many poor supplied;
 Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
 Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds;
 The robe that wraps his limbs in silken sloth
 280 Has robbed the neighboring fields of half their growth;
 His seat, where solitary sports are seen,
 Indignant spurns the cottage from the green;
 Around the world each needful product flies,
 For all the luxuries the world supplies.
 285 While thus the land adorned for pleasure all
 In barren splendor feebly waits the fall.
     As some fair female unadorned and plain,
 Secure to please while youth confirms her reign,
 Slights every borrowed charm that dress supplies,
 290 Nor shares with art the triumph of her eyes:
 But when those charms are past, for charms are frail,
 When time advances, and when lovers fail,
 She then shines forth, solicitous to bless,
 In all the glaring impotence of dress:
 295 Thus fares the land, by luxury betrayed;
 In nature's simplest charms at first arrayed;
 But verging to decline, its splendors rise,
 Its vistas strike, its palaces surprise;
 While scourged by famine from the smiling land,
 300 The mournful peasant leads his humble band;
 And while he sinks without one arm to save,
 The country blooms—a garden, and a grave.
     Where then, ah where, shall Poverty reside,
 To 'scape the pressure of contiguous Pride?
 305 If to some common's fenceless limits strayed,
 He drives his flock to pick the scanty blade,
 Those fenceless fields the sons of wealth divide,
 And even the bare-worn common is denied.
     If to the city sped—What waits him there?
 310 To see profusion that he must not share;
 To see ten thousand baneful arts combined
 To pamper luxury, and thin mankind;
 To see those joys the sons of pleasure know,
 Extorted from his fellow creature's woe.
 315 Here, while the courtier glitters in brocade,
 There the pale artist<sup>o</sup> plies the sickly trade;
 Here, while the proud their long-drawn pomps display,

artisan

There the black gibbet glooms beside the way.
 The dome where Pleasure holds her midnight reign,
 320 Here, richly decked, admits the gorgeous train;
 Turmiltuous grandeur crowds the blazing square,
 The rattling chariots clash, the torches glare.
 Sure scenes like these no troubles e'er annoy!
 Sure these denote one universal joy!
 325 Are these thy serious thoughts?—Ah, turn thine eyes
 Where the poor houseless shivering female lies.
 She once, perhaps, in village plenty blest,
 Has wept at tales of innocence distressed;
 Her modest looks the cottage might adorn,
 330 Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn;
 Now lost to all; her friends, her virtue fled,
 Near her betrayer's door she lays her head.
 And pinched with cold, and shrinking from the shower,
 With heavy heart deplores that luckless hour,
 335 When idly first, ambitious of the town,
 She left her wheel<sup>9</sup> and robes of country brown.       spinning wheel
     Do thine, sweet Auburn, thine, the loveliest train,
     Do thy fair tribes participate her pain?
 Even now, perhaps, by cold and hunger led,
 340 At proud men's doors they ask a little bread!
     Ah, no. To distant climes, a dreary scene,
     Where half the convex world intrudes between,
     Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
     Where wild Altama<sup>7</sup> murmurs to their woe.
 345 Far different there from all that charmed before,
     The various terrors of that horrid shore;
     Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
     And fiercely shed intolerable day;
     Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
 350 But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling;
     Those poisonous fields with rank luxuriance crowned,
     Where the dark scorpion gathers death around;
     Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
     The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake;
 355 Where crouching tigers<sup>8</sup> wait their hapless prey,
     And savage men, more murderous still than they;
     While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
     Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.
     Far different these from every former scene,
 360 The cooling brook, the grassy-vested green,
     The breezy covert of the warbling grove,
     That only sheltered thefts of harmless love.
     Good Heaven! what sorrows gloomed that parting day,
     That called them from their native walks away;
 365 When the poor exiles, every pleasure past,
     Hung round their bowers, and fondly looked their last,
     And took a long farewell, and wished in vain
     For seats like these beyond the western main;

7. The Altamaha River in Georgia.

8. Not the Asiatic tiger but the puma.

And shuddering still to face the distant deep,
 370 Returned and wept, and still returned to weep.
 The good old sire, the first prepared to go
 To new-found worlds, and wept for other's woe.
 But for himself, in conscious virtue brave,
 He only wished for worlds beyond the grave.
 375 His lovely daughter, lovelier in her tears,
 The fond companion of his helpless years,
 Silent went next, neglectful of her charms,
 And left a lover's for a father's arms.
 With louder plaints the mother spoke her woes,
 380 And blessed the cot where every pleasure rose;
 And kissed her thoughtless babes with many a tear,
 And clasped them close in sorrow doubly dear;
 Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief
 In all the silent manliness of grief.
 385 O luxury! Thou cursed by Heaven's decree,
 How ill exchanged are things like these for thee!
 How do thy portions, with insidious joy,
 Diffuse their pleasures only to destroy!
 Kingdoms, by thee, to sickly greatness grown,
 390 Boast of a florid vigor not their own.
 At every draught more large and large they grow,
 A bloated mass of rank unwieldy woe;
 Till sapped their strength, and every part unsound,
 Down, down they sink, and spread a ruin round.
 395 Even now the devastation is begun,
 And half the business of destruction done;
 Even now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
 I see the rural Virtues leave the land.
 Down where yon anchoring vessel spreads the sail,
 400 That idly waiting flaps with every gale,
 Downward they move, a melancholy band,
 Pass from the shore, and darken all the strand.
 Contented Toil, and hospitable Care,
 And kind connubial Tenderness are there;
 405 And Piety, with wishes placed above,
 And steady Loyalty, and faithful Love:
 And thou, sweet Poetry, thou loveliest maid,
 Still<sup>o</sup> first to fly where sensual joys invade;
 Unfit in these degenerate times of shame,
 410 To catch the heart, or strike for honest fame;
 Dear charming Nymph, neglected and decried,
 My shame in crowds, my solitary pride;
 Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
 That found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so;
 415 Thou guide by which the nobler arts excel,
 Thou nurse of every virtue, fare thee well.
 Farewell, and O! where'er thy voice be tried
 On Torno's cliffs, or Pambamarca's side,<sup>9</sup>
 Whether where equinoctial fervors glow,

always

9. The river Torne in Sweden falls into the Gulf of Bothnia. Pambamarca is a mountain in Ecuador.

Or winter wraps the polar world in snow,
 Still let thy voice, prevailing over time,
 Redress the rigors of the inclement clime;
 Aid slighted truth, with thy persuasive strain
 Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain;
 Teach him that states of native strength possessed,
 Though very poor, may still be very blest;
 That Trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,
 As ocean sweeps the labored mole' away;
 While self-dependent power can time defy,
 As rocks resist the billows and the sky.<sup>2</sup>

GEORGE CRABBE

1754-1832

George Crabbe survived through the Romantic period, but his first successful poem is very much a part of eighteenth-century literature. Born to poverty in a small, decayed Suffolk seaport, Aldeburgh, he was apprenticed to a surgeon, but could not manage to earn a living by practicing in his native village. In 1780 he went to London where, finding neither a patron nor a position, and reduced to desperate straits, he sent an appeal to Edmund Burke, who recognized his merit and gave him timely help. Through Burke's influence, The Librarian<sup>1</sup> was published; Samuel Johnson agreed to correct The Village (1783); and Crabbe was ordained a minister in the Anglican Church. His appointment as chaplain to the Duke of Butland enabled him to marry the woman to whom he had long been engaged.

After 1785 he published nothing until 1807, when The Parish Register appeared. It was followed by The Borough (1810), Tales (1812), and Tales of the Hall (1819). In these poems, which won the admiration of William Wordsworth, Sir Walter Scott, and Lord Byron, Crabbe developed his powers of narrative and characterization. The Village was widely read, although its unrelieved realism and gloom set it sharply apart from conventional poems on rural life. Indeed, it is an angry, scornful reply to the sentimental cult of rural simplicity, innocence, and happiness. It mocks the unreality of pastoral conventions and systematically answers Oliver Goldsmith's idealization of villagers and their life in The Deserted Village. Crabbe knew the degrading effect of hopeless poverty, he had observed rural vice, and he knew the gulf that sometimes separated the landed gentry from their laboring tenants. Out of recollections of Aldeburgh and the neighboring seacoast, he fashioned for his poem a setting whose nigardly nature seems the only proper background for the rugged people who inhabit it. The accuracy of the details created a poetry of the ugly and the barren that has always appealed to readers who prefer plain truth to pretty illusions.

From The VillageFrom Book 1

- The village life, and every care that reigns
 O'er youthful peasants and declining swains;
 What labor yields, and what, that labor past,
 Age, in its hour of languor, finds at last;
 5 What forms the real picture of the poor,
 Demand a song—the Muse can give no more.
 Fled are those times when, in harmonious strains,
 The rustic poet praised his native plains.
 No shepherds now, in smooth alternate<sup>0</sup> verse, metrically regular 10 Their country's beauty or their nymphs' rehearse;
 Yet still for these we frame the tender strain,
 Still in our lays fond Corydons<sup>1</sup> complain,
 And shepherds' boys their amorous pains reveal,
 The only pains, alas! they never feel.
 15 On Mincio's banks, in Caesar's bounteous reign,
 If Tityrus found the Golden Age again,
 Must sleepy bards the flattering dream prolong,
 Mechanic echoes of the Mantuan song?<sup>2</sup>
 From Truth and Nature shall we widely stray, 20 Where Virgil, not where Fancy, leads the way?
 Yes, thus the Muses sing of happy swains,
 Because the Muses never knew their pains.
 They boast their peasants' pipes; but peasants now
 Resign their pipes and plod behind the plow;
 25 And few, amid the rural tribe, have time
 To number syllables, and play with rhyme;
 Save honest Duck,<sup>3</sup> what son of verse could share
 The poet's rapture, and the peasant's care?
 Or the great labors of the field degrade,
 30 With the new peril of a poorer trade?
 From this chief cause these idle praises spring,
 That themes so easy few forbear to sing;
 For no deep thought the trifling subjects ask:
 To sing of shepherds is an easy task.
 35 The happy youth assumes the common strain,
 A nymph his mistress, and himself a swain;
 With no sad scenes he clouds his tuneful prayer,
 But all, to look like her, is painted fair.
 I grant indeed that fields and flocks have charms
 40 For him that grazes or for him that farms;
 But when amid such pleasing scenes I trace
 The poor laborious natives of the place,
 And see the midday sun, with fervid ray,
 On their bare heads and dewy temples play;

1. "Corydon" is a stock name for a shepherd in pastorals, used by both Theocritus and Virgil.

2. Virgil was born near Mantua, in Italy, not far from the river Mincius. Tityrus is one of the speakers in Virgil's Eclogues 1.

3. Stephen Duck (1705-1756), the "Thresher Poet," was a self-educated agricultural laborer whose verses attracted attention and finally won him the patronage of Queen Caroline.

While some, with feebler heads and fainter hearts,
 Deplore their fortune, yet sustain their parts:
 Then shall I dare these real ills to hide
 In tinsel trappings of poetic pride?

No; cast by Fortune on a frowning coast,
 Which neither groves nor happy valleys boast;
 Where other cares than those the Muse relates,
 And other shepherds dwell with other mates;
 By such examples taught, I paint the cot,<sup>o</sup>
 As Truth will paint it, and as bards will not:
 Nor you, ye poor, of lettered scorn complain,
 To you the smoothest song is smooth in vain;
 O'ercome by labor, and bowed down by time,
 Feel you the barren flattery of a rhyme?
 Can poets soothe you, when you pine for bread,
 By winding myrtles round your ruined shed?
 Can their light tales your weighty griefs o'erpower,
 Or glad with airy mirth the toilsome hour?

cottage

Lo! where the heath, with withering brake grown o'er,
 Lends the light turf that warms the neighboring poor;
 From thence a length of burning sand appears,
 Where the thin harvest waves its withered ears;
 Rank weeds, that every art and care defy,
 Reign o'er the land, and rob the blighted rye:
 There thistles stretch their prickly arms afar,
 And to the ragged infant threaten war;
 There poppies, nodding, mock the hope of toil;
 There the blue bugloss paints the sterile soil;
 Hardy and high, above the slender sheaf,
 The slimy mallow waves her silky leaf;
 O'er the young shoot the charlock throws a shade,
 And clasping tares cling round the sickly blade;
 With mingled tints the rocky coasts abound,
 And a sad splendor vainly shines around.
 So looks the nymph whom wretched arts adorn,
 Betrayed by man, then left for man to scorn;
 Whose cheek in vain assumes the mimic rose,
 While her sad eyes the troubled breast disclose;
 Whose outward splendor is but folly's dress,
 Exposing most, when most it gilds distress.

Here joyless roam a wild amphibious race,
 With sullen woe displayed in every face;
 Who far from civil arts and social fly,
 And scowl at strangers with suspicious eye.

Here too the lawless merchant of the main
 Draws from his plow the intoxicated swain;
 Want only claimed the labor of the day,
 But vice now steals his nightly rest away.

Where are the swains, who, daily labor done,
 With rural games played down the setting sun;
 Who struck with matchless force the bounding ball,
 Or made the ponderous quoit obliquely fall;
 While some huge Ajax, terrible and strong,

Engaged some artful stripling of the throng,
 And fell beneath him, foiled, while far around 100 Hoarse triumph rose, and rocks returned the sound?
 Where now are these?—Beneath yon cliff they stand,
 To show the freighted pinnace where to land;<sup>4</sup>
 To load the ready steed with guilty haste;
 To fly in terror o'er the pathless waste;
 105 Or, when detected in their straggling course,
 To foil their foes by cunning or by force;
 Or yielding part (which equal knaves demand)
 To gain a lawless passport<sup>5</sup> through the land.
 Here, wandering long amid these frowning fields,
 no I sought the simple life that Nature yields;
 Rapine and Wrong and Fear usurped her place,
 And a bold, artful, surly, savage race;
 Who, only skilled to take the finny tribe,
 The yearly dinner, or septennial bribe,<sup>6</sup>
 115 Wait on the shore, and, as the waves run high,
 On the tossed vessel bend their eager eye,
 Which to their coast directs its venturous way;
 Theirs, or the ocean's, miserable prey.
 As on their neighboring beach yon swallows stand,
 120 And wait for favoring winds to leave the land,
 While still for flight the ready wing is spread:
 So waited I the favoring hour, and fled;
 Fled from these shores where guilt and famine reign,
 And cried, "Ah! hapless they who still remain;
 125 Who still remain to hear the ocean roar,
 Whose greedy waves devour the lessening shore;
 Till some fierce tide, with more imperious sway,
 Sweeps the low hut and all it holds away;
 When the sad tenant weeps from door to door,
 130 And begs a poor protection from the poor!"
 Rut these are scenes where Nature's niggard hand
 Gave a spare portion to the famished land;
 Hers is the fault, if here mankind complain
 Of fruitless toil and labor spent in vain.
 135 But yet in other scenes, more fair in view,
 Where Plenty smiles—alas! she smiles for few—
 And those who taste not, yet behold her store,
 Are as the slaves that dig the golden ore, r-
 The wealth around them makes them doubly poor. J
 140 Or will you deem them amply paid in health,
 Labor's fair child, that languishes with wealth?
 Go, then! and see them rising with the sun,
 Through a long course of daily toil to run;
 See them beneath the dog star's raging heat,
 145 When the knees tremble and the temples beat;
 Behold them, leaning on their scythes, look o'er

4. Smuggling was common on the East Anglian coast.

5. License to import or travel.

6. Paid to electors by candidates for election to Parliament. Because parliaments must be elected at least every seven years, the bribes are "septennial."

The labor past, and toils to come explore;
 See them alternate suns and showers engage,
 And hoard up aches and anguish for their age;
 150 Through fens and marshy moors their steps pursue,
 When their warm pores imbibe the evening dew;
 Then own that labor may as fatal be
 To these thy slaves, as thine excess to thee.
     Amid this tribe too oft a manly pride
 155 Strives in strong toil the fainting heart to hide;
 There may you see the youth of slender frame
 Contend, with weakness, weariness, and shame;
 Yet, urged along, and proudly loath to yield,
 He strives to join his fellows of the field;
 160 Till long-contending nature droops at last,
 Declining health rejects his poor repast,
 His cheerless spouse the coming danger sees,
 And mutual murmurs urge the slow disease.
     Yet grant them health, 'tis not for us to tell,
 165 Though the head droops not, that the heart is well;
 Or will you praise that homely, healthy fare,
 Plenteous and plain, that happy peasants sharer
 Oh! trifle not with wants you cannot feel,
 Nor mock the misery of a stinted meal,
 170 Homely, not wholesome; plain, not plenteous; such
 As you who praise would never deign to touch.
     Ye gentle souls, who dream of rural ease,
 Whom the smooth stream and smoother sonnet please;
 Go! if the peaceful cot your praises share,
 175 Go, look within, and ask if peace be there:
 If peace be his—that drooping weary sire,
 Or theirs, that offspring round their feeble fire;
 Or hers, that matron pale, whose trembling hand
 Turns on the wretched hearth the expiring brand!

WILLIAM COWPER
 1731-1800

There are no saner poems in the language than William Cowper's, yet they were written by a man who was periodically insane and who for forty years lived day to day with the possibility of madness. After attempting suicide in 1763, he believed that he was damned for having committed the unforgivable sin, the "sin against the Holy Ghost." From then on, a refugee from life, he looked for hope in Evangelicalism and found shelter first, in 1765, in the pious family of the clergyman Morley Unwin, and after Unwin's death, with his widow, Mary Unwin, who cared for Cowper until her death in 1796. Their move to rural Olney (pronounced Chvn-y) in 1768 brought them under the influence of the strenuous and fervent Evangelical minister John Newton, author of "Amazing Grace." With him Cowper wrote the famous Olney Hymns, still familiar to Methodists and other Nonconformists. But a second attack of madness, in 1773, not only frustrated his planned marriage to Mary Unwin but left him for the rest of his life with the assurance that he had been cast out by God. He never again attended services, and the main purpose of his life thereafter was to divert his mind from numb despair by every possible innocent device. He gardened, he kept pets, he walked, he wrote letters (some of the best of the century), he conversed, he read—and he wrote poetry. When it was published, it brought him a measure of fame that his modest nature could never have hoped for.

Cowper's major work is The Task (1785), undertaken at the bidding of Lady Austen, a friend who, when he complained that he had no subject, directed him to write about the sofa in his parlor. It began with a mock-heroic account of the development of the sofa from a simple stool, but it grew into a long meditative poem of more than five thousand lines. The poet describes his small world of country, village, garden, and parlor, and from time to time he glances toward the great world to condemn cities and worldliness, war and slavery, luxury and corruption. The tone is muted, the sensibility delicate, the language on the whole precise and clear. Cowper does not strive to be great, yet his contemporaries recognized their own concerns in his pious and humorous musings. Blake, Wordsworth, and Coleridge felt close to him, and so did many literary women. No eighteenth-century poet was more beloved.

[A LANDSCAPE DESCRIBED. RURAL SOUNDS]

150 Thou<sup>1</sup> knowest my praise of nature most sincere,
 And that my raptures are not conjured up
 To serve occasions of poetic pomp,
 But genuine, and art partner of them all.
 How oft upon yon eminence our pace
 155 Has slackened to a pause, and we have borne
 The ruffling wind, scarce conscious that it blew,
 While admiration, feeding at the eye,
 And still unsated, dwelt upon the scene.
 Thence with what pleasure have we just discerned
 160 The distant plow slow moving, and beside
 His laboring team, that swerved not from the track,
 The sturdy swain diminished to a boy!
 Here Ouse,<sup>2</sup> slow winding through a level plain
 Of spacious meads with cattle sprinkled o'er,
 165 Conducts the eye along its sinuous course
 Delighted. There, fast rooted in their bank,
 Stand, never overlooked, our favorite elms,
 That screen the herdsman's solitary hut;
 While far beyond, and overthwart the stream
 170 That, as with molten glass, inlays the vale,
 The sloping land recedes into the clouds;
 Displaying on its varied side the grace

1. Mary Unwin.

2. The village of Olney, where Cowper and Mary Unwin were living, is situated on the river Ouse.

Of hedgerow beauties numberless, square tower,
 Tall spire, from which the sound of cheerful bells
 Just undulates upon the listening ear,
 Groves, heaths, and smoking villages, remote.
 Scenes must be beautiful, which, daily viewed,
 Please daily, and whose novelty survives
 Long knowledge and the scrutiny of years—
 Praise justly due to those that I describe.

Nor rural sights alone, but rural sounds,
 Exhilarate the spirit, and restore
 The tone of languid Nature. Mighty winds,
 That sweep the skirt of some far-spreading wood
 Of ancient growth, make music not unlike
 The dash of ocean on his winding shore,
 And lull the spirit while they fill the mind;
 Unnumbered branches waving in the blast,
 And all their leaves fast fluttering, all at once.
 Nor less composure waits upon the roar
 Of distant floods, or on the softer voice
 Of neighboring fountain, or of rills that slip
 Through the cleft rock, and, chiming as they fall
 Upon loose pebbles, lose themselves at length
 In matted grass, that with a livelier green
 Betrays the secret of their silent course.
 Nature inanimate employs sweet sounds,
 But animated nature sweeter still,
 To soothe and satisfy the human ear.
 Ten thousand warblers cheer the day, and one
 The livelong night: nor these alone, whose notes
 Nice-fingered art<sup>3</sup> must emulate in vain,
 But cawing rooks, and kites that swim sublime
 In still repeated circles, screaming loud,
 The jay, the pie,<sup>o</sup> and even the boding owl
 That hails the rising moon, have charms for me.
 Sounds inharmonious in themselves and harsh,
 Yet heard in scenes where peace forever reigns,
 And only there, please highly for their sake.

[CRAZY KATE]

There often wanders one, whom better days
 535 Saw better clad, in cloak of satin trimmed
 With lace, and hat with splendid ribband bound.
 A servingmaid was she, and fell in love
 With one who left her, went to sea, and died.
 Her fancy followed him through foaming waves
 540 To distant shores; and she would sit and weep
 At what a sailor suffers; fancy, too,
 Delusive most where warmest wishes are,
 Would oft anticipate his glad return,
 And dream of transports she was not to know.

3. Refined skill, such as that of a flutist imitating the nightingale's song.

545 She heard the doleful tidings of his death—
 And never smiled again! And now she roams
 The dreary waste; there spends the livelong day,
 And there, unless when charity forbids,
 The livelong night. A tattered apron hides,
 550 Worn as a cloak, and hardly hides, a gown
 More tattered still; and both but ill conceal
 A bosom heaved with never-ceasing sighs.
 She begs an idle pin of all she meets,
 And hoards them in her sleeve; but needful food,
 555 Though pressed with hunger oft, or comelier clothes,
 Though pinched with cold, asks never.—Kate is crazed!

[THE STRICKEN DEER]

I was a stricken deer, that left the herd
 Long since; with many an arrow deep infix'd
 My panting side was charged, when I withdrew
 To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
 There was I found by one who had himself
 Been hurt by the archers. In his side he bore,
 And in his hands and feet, the cruel scars.
 115 With gentle force soliciting<sup>4</sup> the darts,
 He drew them forth, and healed, and bade me live.
 Since then, with few associates, in remote
 And silent woods I wander, far from those
 My former partners of the peopled scene;
 120 With few associates, and not wishing more.
 Here much I ruminatè, as much I may,
 With other views of men and manners now
 Than once, and others of a life to come.
 I see that all are wanderers, gone astray
 125 Each in his own delusions; they are lost
 In chase of fancied happiness, still woo'd
 And never won. Dream after dream ensues;
 And still they dream that they shall still succeed,
 And still are disappointed. Rings the world
 With the vain stir. I sum up half mankind
 And add two-thirds of the remaining half,
 And find the total of their hopes and fears
 Dreams, empty dreams.

From Book 4

[THE WINTER EVENING: A BROWN STUDY]

Come evening once again, season of peace,
 Return sweet evening, and continue long!
 245 Methinks I see thee in the streaky west,

4. "To endeavor to draw out by the use of gentle force" (OED).

With matron-step slow-moving, while the night
 Treads on thy sweeping train; one hand employed
 In letting fall the curtain of repose
 On bird and beast, the other charged for man
 With sweet oblivion of the cares of day;
 Not sumptuously adorned, nor needing aid
 Like homely featured night, of clustering gems;
 A star or two just twinkling on thy brow
 Suffices thee; save that the moon is thine
 No less than hers, not worn indeed on high
 With ostentatious pageantry, but set
 With modest grandeur in thy purple zone,<sup>5</sup>
 Resplendent less, but of an ampler round.<sup>6</sup>
 Come then and thou shalt find thy votary calm,
 Or make me so. Composure is thy gift.
 And whether I devote thy gentle hours
 To books, to music, or the poet's toil,
 To weaving nets for bird-alluring fruit;
 Or twining silken threads round ivory reels
 When they command whom man was born to please;<sup>7</sup>
 I slight thee not, but make thee welcome still.

Just when our drawing rooms begin to blaze
 With lights by clear reflection multiplied
 From many a mirror, in which he of Gath,
 Goliath,<sup>8</sup> might have seen his giant bulk
 Whole without stooping, towering crest and all,
 My pleasures too begin. But me perhaps
 The glowing hearth may satisfy awhile
 With faint illumination that uplifts
 The shadow to the ceiling, there by fits
 Dancing uncouthly to the quivering flame.
 Not undelightful is an hour to me
 So spent in parlor twilight; such a gloom
 Suits well the thoughtful or unthinking mind,
 The mind contemplative, with some new theme
 Pregnant, or indisposed alike to all.
 Laugh ye, who boast your more mercurial powers
 That never feel a stupor, know no pause,
 Nor need one. I am conscious,<sup>9</sup> and confess,
 Fearless, a soul that does not always think.
 Me oft has fancy ludicrous and wild
 Soothed with a waking dream of houses, towers,
 Trees, churches, and strange visages expressed
 In the red cinders, while with poring eye
 I gazed, myself creating what I saw.
 Nor less amused have I quiescent watched
 The sooty films that play upon the bars,<sup>9</sup>

conscious of

5. Encircling band. Evening is seen both as a personified goddess, whose "zone" is her royal belt, and as a natural phenomenon, where the "zone" is a stripe of color in the sky.

6. The moon looks larger at evening, when just over the horizon, than at night, when it is higher and brighter.

7. I.e., women.

8. Goliath, the giant of Gath slain by David (I Samuel 17.19-51).

9. The grate of a fireplace.

Pendulous and foreboding, in the view
 Of superstition prophesying still,
 295 Though still deceived, some stranger's near approach.<sup>1</sup>
 'Tis thus the understanding takes repose
 In indolent vacuity of thought,
 And sleeps and is refreshed. Meanwhile the face
 Conceals the mood lethargic with a mask 300 Of deep deliberation, as<sup>o</sup> the man as if
 Were tasked to his full strength, absorbed and lost.
 Thus oft reclined at ease, I lose an hour
 At evening, till at length the freezing blast
 That sweeps the bolted shutter, summons home
 305 The recollected powers, and snapping short
 The glassy threads with which the fancy weaves
 Her brittle toys, restores me to myself.
 How calm is my recess, and how the frost,
 Raging abroad, and the rough wind, endear
 310 The silence and the warmth enjoyed within.
 I saw the woods and fields at close of day,
 A variegated show; the meadows green,
 Though faded; and the lands where lately waved
 The golden harvest, of a mellow brown,
 315 Upturned so lately by the forceful share.<sup>o</sup> plowshare
 I saw far off the weedy fallows<sup>2</sup> smile
 With verdure not unprofitable, grazed
 By flocks fast feeding and selecting each
 His favorite herb; while all the leafless groves
 320 That skirt the horizon wore a sable hue,
 Scarce noticed in the kindred dusk of eve.
 Tomorrow brings a change, a total change!
 Which even now, though silently performed
 And slowly, and by most unfelt, the face
 325 Of universal nature undergoes.
 Fast falls a fleecy shower. The downy flakes,
 Descending and with never-ceasing lapse,<sup>3</sup>
 Softly alighting upon all below,
 Assimilate all objects. Earth receives
 330 Gladly the thickening mantle, and the green
 And tender blade that feared the chilling blast,
 Escapes unhurt beneath so warm a veil.

The Castaway

Obscurest night involved the sky,
 The Atlantic billows roared,
 When such a destined wretch as I,

1. The piece of soot that often flaps on the bars of a grate was called a "stranger" and was supposed to portend an unexpected visitor. Cf. lines 272—

310 with Coleridge's "Frost at Midnight."

2. Plowed but unseeded land.

3. Gentle downward glide.

Washed headlong from on board,
 5 Of friends, of hope, of all bereft,
 His floating home forever left.

No braver chief<sup>1</sup> could Albion boast
 Than he with whom he went,
 Nor ever ship left Albion's coast,
 10 With warmer wishes sent.
 He loved them both, but both in vain,
 Nor him beheld, nor her again.

Not long beneath the whelming brine,
 Expert to swim, he lay;
 is Nor soon he felt his strength decline,
 Or courage die away;
 But waged with death a lasting strife,
 Supported by despair of life.

He shouted; nor his friends had failed
 20 To check the vessel's course,
 But so the furious blast prevailed,
 That, pitiless perforce,
 They left their outcast mate behind,
 And scudded still before the wind.

Some succor yet they could afford;
 And, such as storms allow,
 The cask, the coop, the floated cord,
 Delayed not to bestow.
 But he (they knew) nor ship, nor shore,
 30 Whate'er they gave, should visit more.

Nor, cruel as it seemed, could he
 Their haste himself condemn,
 Aware that flight, in such a sea,
 Alone could rescue them;
 35 Yet bitter felt it still to die
 Deserted, and his friends so nigh.

He long survives, who lives an hour
 In ocean, self-upheld;
 And so long he, with unspent power,
 40 His destiny repelled;
 And ever, as the minutes flew,
 Entreated help, or cried, "Adieu!"

At length, his transient respite past,
 His comrades, who before
 45 Had heard his voice in every blast,
 Could catch the sound no more.

1. George, Lord Anson (1697-1762), in whose Voyage (1748) Cowper, years before writing this poem, had read the story of the sailor washed overboard in a storm.

For then, by toil subdued, he drank
The stifling wave, and then he sank.

No poet wept him; but the page
so Of narrative sincere,
That tells his name, his worth, his age,
Is wet with Anson's tear.
And tears by bards or heroes shed
„ Alike immortalize the dead.

55 I therefore purpose not, or dream,
Descanting on his fate,
To give the melancholy theme
A more enduring date:
But misery still delights to trace
60 Its semblance in another's case.

No voice divine the storm allayed,
No light propitious shone,
When, snatched from all effectual aid,
We perished, each alone;
65 But I heneath a rougher sea,
And whelmed in deeper gulfs than he.

Popular ballads

The English and Scottish popular ballads were originally narrative poems transmitted orally and only rarely recorded in some manuscript or song book until systematic efforts were made to collect and publish them in the late eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries. It is therefore difficult to fit them into an anthology divided into historical periods because their anonymity and oral provenance resist periodization. The earlier collectors chose to believe that their material was very old. Among the first, Bishop Percy (1729—1811), whose literary interest in ballads was awakened by his chance discovery of a seventeenth-century manuscript in which a number of them had been copied down, called his three-volume collection Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765). There is no evidence, however, that any but a handful of the surviving ballads are older than the seventeenth century. Percy's followers, notably Sir Walter Scott, whose Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border (1802—03) enjoyed a great success, went to the living sources of the ballads and set them down on paper at the dictation of the people among whom the old poems were still being recited and sung. Oral tradition survives longest in regions remote from urbanization and written culture. Many of the best English ballads derive from the border regions between the Scottish Highlands and Lowlands and between Scotland and England, from where they were exported to America, where they continued to flourish on the Appalachian frontier.

The distinctive quality shared by most popular ballads is spareness: the narrative style typically strips the story down to a few objective and dramatic scenes. Ballads are apt to deal only with the culminating incident or climax of a plot, to describe that event with intense compression, to put the burden of narration on allusive monologue or dialogue, and to avoid editorial comment. The force of the ballad often depends on what is not told directly, which must be inferred from dialogue and action.

Oral poetry depends on regular meter and heavy use of formulaic expressions. The narrative progresses by stanzas that are often linked by repetition. The most common stanza form, called ballad stanza, is a quatrain rhyming abch in which the a and c lines usually have four beats and the b lines three (as in "Sir Patrick Spens"). Alternatively, a ballad may be arranged in couplets ("The Three Ravens"). Ballads are known to have been recited, but the stanzaic and formulaic quality of many of them is enhanced by the fact that they are also songs, set to simple, haunting melodies. The practice of using refrains (as in "The Three Ravens") and other kinds of repetition probably lent the ballad one of its most impressive qualities, for while the actual narratives are tightly compressed, ballads rarely develop in an unbroken line. The reader—originally, the hearer—is constantly made to pause by a repeated phrase or even by nonsense syllables, which retard the action in a suspenseful way. The progress to a foreknown, foredoomed conclusion is paradoxically made to seem more inevitable, more urgent, by such relaxations of narrative tension.

Some of the best ballads have as their subject a tragic incident—often a murder or accidental death, at times involving supernatural elements. These motifs are part of the common legacy of European folklore, and many of the English and Scottish ballads have their counterparts in other languages. To this class belong, of the selections here, "The Three Ravens," "Lord Bandall," "The Wife of Usher's Well," "Bonny Barbara Allan," and—although not in its present form—"Sir Patrick Spens."

A few ballads go back to incidents recorded elsewhere. "The Bonny Earl of Murray" laments the political murder of a popular sixteenth-century Scots noble. "Sir Patrick Spens," scholars have conjectured, may be based on a historical incident of the end of the thirteenth century. The publication of ballads in the eighteenth century by Bishop Percy and others helped to inspire literary imitations, such as those by William Wordsworth and Samuel Coleridge in the Lyrical Ballads. The adoption by these Romantic poets of what they conceived to be the simple and natural style of the folk had at the time political as well as literary implications. During the 1960s the American antiwar and civil rights movements inspired original ballads by performers like Bob Dylan and by African American poets like Dudley Bandall. Thus protesters at different periods of time have taken over the style and manner of this seemingly timeless poetry.

Ballad collectors found that basically the same poem appeared in various versions in different manuscripts or was rendered differently by different performers. Thus when one speaks of "Sir Patrick Spens," one is actually speaking of a number of poems that tell the same story in slightly or widely different words. F. J. Child, in the great collection English and Scottish Popular Ballads, prints several versions. The numbers under which Child lists each of the ballads printed here and the provenance of the particular version are given in the footnotes to individual titles. Spelling has been modernized; most of the northernisms in the originals have been retained.

Lord Randall<sup>1</sup>

- "Oh where ha'e ye been, Lord Randall my son?
 O where ha'e ye been, my handsome young man?"
 "I ha'e been to the wild wood: mother, make my bed soon,
 For I'm weary wi' hunting, and fain° wald° lie gladly/would down."
- 5 "Where gat ye your dinner, Lord Randall my son?
 Where gat ye your dinner, my handsome young man?"
 "I dined wi' my true love: mother, make my bed soon,
 For I'm weary wi' hunting, and fain wald lie down."
- 10 "What gat ye to your dinner, Lord Randall my son?
 What gat ye to your dinner, my handsome young man?"
 "I gat eels boiled in broo:° mother, make my bed soon, broth
 For I'm weary wi' hunting and fain wald lie down."
- "What became of your bloodhounds, Lord Randall my son?
 What became of your bloodhounds, my handsome young man?"
 15 "O they swelled and they died: mother, make my bed soon,
 For I'm weary wi' hunting and fain wald lie down."
- "O I fear ye are poisoned, Lord Randall my son!
 O I fear ye are poisoned, my handsome young man!"
 "Oh yes, I am poisoned: mother, make my bed soon, 20 For I'm sick at the heart, and I fain wald lie down."

Bonny Barbara Allan<sup>1</sup>

It was in and about the Martinmas<sup>0</sup> time, November 11
 When the green leaves were a-fallin';

That Sir John Graeme in the West Country
Fell in love with Barbara Allan.

5 He sent his man down through the town
To the place where she was dwellin':
"O haste and come to my master dear, Gin<sup>o</sup> ye be Barbara Allan." if

O hooly,<sup>o</sup> hooly rase<sup>o</sup> she up, gently/rose
10 To the place where he was Iyin',
And when she drew the curtain by:
"Young man, I think you're dyin'."

"O it's I'm sick, and very, very sick,
And 'tis a' for Barbara Allan."
15 "O the better for me ye saF never be, shall Though your heart's blood were a-spillin'.

"O dinna ye mind,<sup>2</sup> young man," said she,
"When ye the cups were fillin',
That ye made the healths gae<sup>o</sup> round and round, go
20 And slighted Barbara Allan?"

He turned his face unto the wall,
And death with him was dealin':
"Adieu, adieu, my dear friends all,
And be kind to Barbara Allan."

25 And slowly, slowly, rase she up,
And slowly, slowly left him;
And sighing said she could not stay,
Since death of life had reft<sup>o</sup> him. deprived

She had not gane<sup>o</sup> a mile but twa,<sup>o</sup> gone/two 30 When she heard the dead-bell knellin',
And every jow<sup>o</sup> that the dead-bell ga'ed<sup>o</sup> stroke / made
It cried, "Woe to Barbara Allan!"

"O mother, mother, make my bed,
O make it soft and narrow:
35 Since my love died for me today,
I'll die for him tomorrow."

The Wife of Usher's Well<sup>1</sup>

There lived a wife at Usher's Well,
And a wealthy wife was she;
She had three stout and stalwart sons,
And sent them o'er the sea.

2. Don't you remember.

1. Child, no. 79. From Scott (1802), from the recitation of an old woman.

They hadna' been a week from her,
 A week but barely ane,<sup>o</sup> one
 When word came to the carlin<sup>o</sup> wife old
 That her three sons were gane.<sup>o</sup> gone

They hadna' been a week from her,
 A week but barely three,
 When word came to the carlin wife
 That her sons she'd never see.

"I wish the wind may never cease
 Nor fashes<sup>o</sup> in the flood, disturbances
 Till my three sons come hame<sup>o</sup> to me, home
 In earthly flesh and blood."

It fell about the Martinmas,<sup>o</sup> November 11
 When nights are long and mirk,<sup>o</sup> dark
 The carlin wife's three sons came hame,
 And their hats were o' the birk.<sup>2</sup>

It neither grew in sike<sup>o</sup> nor ditch, field
 Nor yet in ony sheugh,<sup>o</sup> furrow
 But at the gates o' Paradise
 That birk grew fair eneugh.

"Blow up the fire, my maidens,
 Bring water from the well:
 For a' my house shall feast this night,
 Since my three sons are well."

And she has made to them a bed,
 She's made it large and wide,
 And she's ta'en her mantle her about,
 Sat down at the bedside.

Up then crew the red, red cock,
 And up and crew the gray.
 The eldest to the youngest said,
 "'Tis time we were away."<sup>3</sup>

The cock he hadna' crawled but once,
 And clapped his wings at a',
 When the youngest to the eldest said,
 "Brother, we must awa'.<sup>o</sup> away

"The cock doth craw, the day doth daw,<sup>o</sup> dawn
 The channerin'<sup>o</sup> worm doth chide: fretting
 Gin<sup>o</sup> we be missed out o' our place, if
 A sair pain we maun bide.<sup>4</sup>
 "Fare ye weel,<sup>o</sup> my mother dear, well

2. Birch. Those returning from the dead were thought to wear vegetation on their heads.

3. The dead must return to their graves at cock-

The Three Ravens<sup>1</sup>

There were three ravens sat on a tree,
Down a down, hay down, hay down
 There were three ravens sat on a tree,
With a down

- 5 There were three ravens sat on a tree,
 They were as black as they might be,
With a down, derry, derry, derry, down, down.<sup>2</sup>

The one of them said to his mate,
 "Where shall we our breakfast take?"

- 10 "Down in yonder green field
 There lies a knight slain under his shield.

"His hounds they lie down at his feet,
 So well they can their master keep.

- 15 "His hawks they fly so eagerly,<sup>o</sup> fiercely
 There's no fowl<sup>o</sup> dare him come nigh. bird

Down there comes a fallow<sup>o</sup> doe, red-brown
 As great with young as she might go.<sup>o</sup> walk

She lifted up his bloody head,
 And kissed his wounds that were so red.

- 20 She got him up upon her back,
 And carried him to earthen lake.<sup>o</sup> pit

She buried him before the prime;<sup>3</sup>
 She was dead herself ere evensong time.

- 25 God send every gentleman
 Such hawks, such hounds, and such a lemman." mistress

Sir Patrick Spens<sup>1</sup>

The king sits in Dumferline town,
 Drinking the blude-reid<sup>o</sup> wine: bloodred

But lang owe" a' the play were played ere
Their hats they swam aboon.° above
- O lang, lang may their ladies sit,
Wi' their fans into their hand,
35 Or e'er they see Sir Patrick Spens
Come sailing to the land.
- O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi' their gold kembs° in their hair, combs
Waiting for their ain° dear lords, own
40 For they'll see thame na mair.° more
- Half o'er,<sup>0</sup> half o'er to Aberdour halfway over
It's fifty fadom° deep, fathoms
And there lies guid Sir Patrick Spens,
Wi' the Scots lords at his feet.

The Bonny Earl of Murray<sup>1</sup>

	Ye Highlands and ye Lawlands, <sup>0</sup>	Lowlands
	O where have you been?
	They have slain the Earl of Murray,
	And they laid him on the green.
5	"Now wae° be to thee, Huntly, <sup>2</sup>	woe

2. Huntly, who slew Murray in 1592, had been ordered by King James VI of Scotland (the speaker of this stanza) to arrest the earl.

3. The "ring" was a hanging ring that mounted knights tried to impale on their spears.

4. Either the goal in a race or a lady's favor.

Poems in Process

Poets have often claimed that their poems were not willed but were inspired, whether by a muse or by divine visitation, or that they emerged full-blown from the poet's unconscious mind. But working manuscripts tell another story, suggesting that, however involuntary the origin of a poem, vision was usually followed by revision, by second thoughts that refined and clarified an original intention or added something new. And revision can be a social as well as a private drama. As noted in section D ("Publishing History, Censorship") of this anthology's "Literary Terminology" glossary, many people participate in the labor that takes texts from the forms in which authors produce them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. In a similar if more limited way, revision, too, as a part of literary history, involves a range of collaborators, both institutional and personal, witting and unwitting: the copyists who recopy drafts so as to prepare fair copies for the printer and who advance suggestions of their own, the advisors who act as sounding boards, and, by the eighteenth century particularly, the critics whose responses the poet anticipates while revising in the hope of preempting them.

Though poets of all periods have revised their work, evidence of this aspect of their labor is sparse until the nineteenth century. It may be that in earlier times, the drafts and proof sheets that recorded revisions were valued only so long as they were useful (to the person preparing the fair copy or the printer setting the text). This emphasis on utility meant that these materials were often discarded once they had served their purpose. (The seventeenth-century term for working drafts, which we still use—"foul papers"—expresses this attitude.) Fascination with anything the author wrote by hand is a distinctly modern phenomenon, a characteristic of an era in which literature has come to be defined by the uniformity of machine-printed books.

Before the introduction of printing into England in 1476, writing was reproduced by hand, in manuscript (literally "written by hand"). Even after printing was introduced, however, certain forms of writing continued to circulate in manuscript. In a manuscript culture, revision was a complicated matter not always instigated or sanctioned by the individuals we would think of as authors. In certain respects, writers and readers were, for many centuries, able, as we are not, to think of all poems as works in process. Thus poets might be at the mercy of scribes who could mistranscribe their work. Chaucer, for example, jokingly promises to curse his scribe Adam unless he should "write truly according to my composition" (" . . . but after my making thou write more trewe") (Chaucer, "To His Scribe Adam" [318]). Or individuals transcribing poetry into their commonplace books (personalized anthologies) would readily write it down with changes and in so doing blur the lines between authoring and transcribing: sometimes, these transcriptions are the only manuscript evidence that has survived.

Milton is the first major English author for whom we possess drafts of poems definitely written in his own hand. The excerpt below from his manuscript of "Lycidas" shows the extent to which he worked over and expanded his initial attempts. It is no surprise to find Pope, one of the most meticulous of craftsmen, working and reworking his drafts, and radically enlarging The Rape of the Lock even after the success of its first printed version. But the manuscript of Samuel Johnson's greatest poem, "The Vanity of Human Wishes," discovered in the 1940s, is a surprise, for it shows that this writer who, in his critical theory, regarded poetry as primarily an art of achieving preconceived ends by tested means in fact composed with even greater speed and assurance than the Romantic Byron, who liked to represent himself to his readers as dashing off his verses with unreflecting ease. In the manuscript of Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" we find that the poet, by late afterthought, converted a relatively simple elegiac meditation into a longer and much more complex apologia for his chosen way of life. In all these selections, we look on as poets (no matter how rapidly they achieve a result they are willing to let stand) carry on their inevitably tentative efforts to meet the multiple requirements of meaning, syntax, meter, sound pattern, and the constraints of a chosen stanza.

Our transcriptions from the poets' drafts attempt to reproduce, as accurately as the change from script to print will allow, the appearance of the manuscript page. A poet's first attempt at a line or phrase is reproduced in larger type, the revisions in smaller type. The line numbers used to identify an excerpt are those of the final form of the complete poem as reprinted in this anthology. The marginal numbers beside the extract from "The Vanity of Human Wishes" are Johnson's own additions.

SELECTED BIBLIOGRAPHY

Autograph Poetry in the English Language, 2 vols., 1973, compiled by P. J. Croft, reproduces and transcribes one or more pages of manuscript in the poet's own hand, from the fourteenth century to the present time; volume 1 includes many of the poets in this volume of The Norton Anthology of English Literature, from John Skelton to George Crabbe. Books that discuss the process of poetic composition and revision, with examples from manuscripts and printed versions, are Charles D. Abbott, ed., Poets at Work, 1948; Phyllis Bartlett, Poems in Process, 1951; and A. F. Scott, The Poet's Craft, 1957. In Word for Word: A Study of Authors' Alterations, 1965, Wallace Hildick analyzes the composition of prose fiction, as well as poems.

Documents that record a poet's work in progress do not, unfortunately, survive from before the sixteenth century. If you would like to see what Old English poetry looks like on the manuscript page, see, for example, The Nowell Codex, edited by Kemp Malone, 1963, which includes facsimiles of both Beowulf and Judith. You might also consult the Electronic Beowulf Web site: uky.edu/~kiernan/eBeowulf/guide.htm. For images of English literary manuscripts from the later medieval period, some written in the poet's own hand, see Anthony G. Petti, English Literary Hands from Chaucer to Dryden, 1977. Some pages of the Ellesmere manuscript of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales are available at huntington.org/LibraryDiv/ChaucerPict.html. For the survival of certain forms of literary manuscript culture beyond the introduction of print, see Arthur Marotti, Manuscript, Print, and the English Renaissance Lyric, 1995.

ALEXANDER POPE

From The Rape of the Lock<sup>1</sup>[1712 Version: Canto 1, Lines 1—24]

WHAT dire Offence from Am'rous Causes springs,
 What mighty Quarrels rise from Trivial Things,
 I sing—This Verse to C—I, Muse! is due;
 This, ev'n Belinda may vouchsafe to view:
 Slight is the Subject, but not so the Praise,
 If she inspire, and He approve my Lays.
 Say what strange Motive, Goddess! cou'd compel
 A well-bred Lord t'assault a gentle Belle?
 Oh say what stranger Cause, yet unexplor'd,
 Cou'd make a gentle Belle reject a Lord?
 And dwells such Rage in softest Bosoms then?
 And lodge such daring Souls in Little Men?
 Sol thro' white Curtains did his Beams display,
 And op'd those Eyes which brighter shine than they;
Shock just had giv'n himself the rowzing Shake,
 And Nymphs prepar'd their Chocolate to take;
 Thrice the wrought Slipper knock'd against the Ground,
 And striking Watches the tenth Hour resound.
Belinda rose, and 'midst attending Dames
 Launch'd on the Bosom of the silver Thames:
 A Train of well-drest Youths around her shone,
 And ev'ry Eye was fix'd on her alone;
 On her white Breast a sparking Cross she wore,
 Which Jeivs might kiss, and Infidels adore.

[Revised Version: Canto 1, Lines 1—22]

WHAT dire Offence from am'rous Causes springs,
 What mighty Contests rise from trivial Things,
 I sing—This Verse to Caryll, Muse! is due;
 This, ev'n Belinda may vouchsafe to view:
 Slight is the Subject, but not so the Praise,
 If She inspire, and He approve my Lays.
 Say what strange Motive, Goddess! cou'd compel
 A well-bred Lord t'assault a gentle Belle?
 Oh say what stranger Cause, yet unexplor'd,
 Cou'd make a gentle Belle reject a Lord?

1. The first version of The Rape of the Lock, published in 1712, consisted of two cantos and a total of 334 lines. Two years later, in 1714, Pope published an enlarged version of five cantos and 794 lines, in which he added the supernatural "machinery" of the Sylphs and Gnomes as well as a number of mock-epic episodes. The excerpts reprinted here show how Pope revised and expanded passages that he retained from the first version of the poem. The revised version includes changes that Pope added in later editions of the enlarged text of 1714.

In Tasks so bold, can Little Men engage,
 And in soft Bosoms dwells such mighty Rage?
 Sol thro' white Curtains shot a tim'rous Ray,
 And op'd those Eyes that must eclipse the Day;
 Now Lapdogs give themselves the rowzing Shake,
 And sleepless Lovers, just at Twelve, awake:
 Thrice rung the Bell, the Slipper knock'd the Ground,
 And the press'd Watch return'd a silver Sound.
Belinda still her downy Pillow prest,
 Her Guardian Sylph prolong'd the balmy Rest.
 'Twas he had summon'd to her silent Bed
 The Morning-Dream that hover'd o'er her Head.

[Revised Version: Canto 2, Lines J—8]

Not with more Glories, in th' Etherial Plain,
 The Sun first rises o'er the purpled Main,
 Than issuing forth, the Rival of his Beams
 Launch'd on the Bosom of the Silver Thames.
 Fair Nymphs, and well-drest Youths around her shone,
 But ev'ry Eye was fix'd on her alone.
 On her white Breast a sparkling Cross she wore,
 Which Jews might kiss, and Infidels adore.

I. Two of Pope's holograph manuscripts of An Essay on Man have survived. The earlier one is at the Pierpont Morgan Library in New York. The second one, at the Houghton Library, Harvard, was evidently intended as a fair copy for printing; but Pope, who was an inveterate reviser, introduced some last-minute changes. The passage transcribed here from each of these manuscripts is Pope's famed description of man's "middle state" in the great chain of being; in the published version, it opens Epistle 2, lines 1—18.

Created half to rise, & half to fall;
 Great Lord of all things, yet a prey to all;
 Sole Judge of Truth, in endless Error hurl'd;

2. In this version of the manuscript. Pope inserted some marginal glosses. In the right-hand margin (next to the line beginning "Learn we ourselves"), he wrote, "Of Man, as an Individual," while next to the line beginning "Plac'd on this Isthmus," he wrote, "His Middle Nature." And in the left-hand margin, a little below the line beginning "With too much knowledge," he wrote, "His Powers, and Imperfections."

SAMUEL JOHNSON

Johnson told Boswell in 1766 that when composing verses "I have generally had them in my mind, perhaps fifty at a time, walking up and down in my room; and then I have written them down, and often, from laziness, have written only half lines. . . . I remember I wrote a hundred lines of 'The Vanity of Human Wishes' in a day." When the first manuscript draft of this poem turned up in the 1940s among Boswell's papers at Malahide Castle, it supported Johnson's account, for it had been written and corrected in haste, with only sparse punctuation; also the second half of each line had been filled out, obviously from memory, at some time after the writing of the first half, in a darker ink. In the transcriptions from this manuscript (which is in the collection of Mary Hyde, Somerville, New Jersey), the half-lines and emendations that Johnson added to his initial draft are printed in boldface type.

The draft was written on the right-hand pages of a small homemade pocket book; some words in the added half-line, impinging on the right margin of the page, had to be completed above or below the line. The two added lines, "See Nations slowly wise . . . / . . . the tardy Bust," were written on the blank left-hand page, at the place where they were to be inserted. The numeration of every tenth line was added by Johnson in the manuscript and incorporates these two lines.

Johnson published the poem in 1749 and revised it for a second publication in 1755, when it achieved the final form printed in the selections from Johnson, above. It was in 1755 that Johnson introduced his most famous emendation, when, after his disillusionment with Lord Chesterfield as literary patron, he substituted in line 162 the word "patron" for "garret": "Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail."

THOMAS GRAY

There are three manuscript versions of the "Elegy" in Gray's handwriting. The one reproduced here in part is the earliest of these, preserved at Eton College, England; Gray entitled it "Stanzas wrote in a Country Church-Yard."

It is evident that Gray originally intended to conclude his poem at the end of the fifth stanza transcribed below. At some later time he bracketed off the last four stanzas, introduced a transitional stanza that incorporated the last two lines of the original conclusion, and then went on to write a new and much enlarged conclusion to the poem, which includes the closing "Epitaph." A comparison with the final version of the "Elegy," above, will show that the author deleted some of these added stanzas, and also made a number of verbal changes, in his published texts of the poem.

1. I.e., Gray indicates that the second bracketed stanza, above, is to be inserted here, except that the opening "And thou" is to be altered to "For Thee."
 2. At this point in the manuscript Gray ceases to leave a space between the stanzas. The first edition of 1751, at Grays request, was printed without such spaces. They were, however, inserted in later editions printed during Gray's lifetime.

3. These last three stanzas (which Gray in the first edition of 1751 labeled "The Epitaph") are written in the right-hand margin, with the page turned crosswise.

Selected Bibliographies

The Selected Bibliographies consist of a list of Suggested General Readings on English literature, followed by bibliographies for each of the literary periods in this volume. For ease of reference, the authors within each period are arranged in alphabetical order. Entries for certain classes of writings (e.g., "Middle English Lyrics") are included, in alphabetical order, within the listings for individual authors.

SUGGESTED GENERAL READINGS

Histories of England and of English Literature

New research and new perspectives have made even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations seem outmoded. Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England and New Oxford History of England are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, ed. Stanford Lehmborg, 1992, the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford, 1992, and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine, 1996— Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb and Christopher Hibbert, 1986, and Roy Porter's London: A Social History, 1994, valuable.

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, new historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed most significant has expanded in recent years, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to late last night have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. For these more focused accounts, see the listings by period. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, 1993, is useful, as is the seven-volume Penguin History of Literature, 1993–94. The Feminist Companion to Literature in English, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements, 1990, is an important resource, and the editorial materials in The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women, 2nd ed., 1996, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950, rev. 1961, lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Four volumes have been published in the Oxford English Literary History, gen. ed. Jonathan Bate, 2002—: James Simpson, Reform and Cultural Revolution, 1350–1547; Philip Davis, The Victorians, 1830–1880; Randall Stevenson, The Last of England? 1960–2000; and Bruce King, The Internationalization of English Literature, 1948–2000. See also The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. David Wallace, 1999, and The Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller, 2002.

Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik, 1975-83; and Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975-1700, 3rd ed., 1989, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim.

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being, 1936, and Essays in the History of Ideas, 1948, remain valuable, along with such works as Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity, 1935; Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Medieval Political Theology, 1957, new ed. 1997; Richard Popkin, The History of Skepticism from Erasmus to Descartes, 1960; M. #### Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary, 2nd ed., 1989, also available on CD-ROM, and online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary, The Oxford Dictionary of Etymology, and an array of reference works from The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal, 1995, to guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with a ceaseless outpouring of critical appraisals and scholarship. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is the best way to keep abreast of the most recent work and to conduct bibliographic searches. The New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George Watson, 1969-77, updated shorter ed. 1981, is a valuable guide to the huge body of earlier literary criticism and scholarship. A Guide to English and American Literature, ed. F. W. Bateson and Harrison Meserole, rev. 1976, is a selected list of editions, as well as scholarly and critical treatments. Further bibliographical aids are described in Arthur G. Kennedy, A Concise Bibliography for Students of English, rev. 1972; Richard D. Altick and Andrew Wright, Selective Bibliography for the Study of English and American Literature, rev. 1979, and James L. Harner, Literary Research Guide, rev. 1998.

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography, ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison, 2004; condensed biographies will be found in the Concise Dictionary of National Biography, 2 parts (1920, 1988). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions are The Oxford Companion to the Theatre, Phyllis Hartnoll, rev. 1990; Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. Alex Preminger and others, rev. 1993; and The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Margaret Drabble, rev. 1998. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms are The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon, 1991; W. F. Thrall and Addison Hibbard, A Handbook to Literature, ed. C. Hugh Holman, rev. 1992; Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin, rev. 1995; and M. H. Abrams, A Glossary of Literary Terms, rev. 1992. Also useful are Richard Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms, 2nd ed., 1991; Arthur Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase, 1993; and the Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart, 1995. On the Greek and Roman background, see G. M. Kirkwood, A Short Guide to Classical Mythology, 1959; The Oxford Classical Dictionary, rev. 1996; and The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson and Ian Chilvers, rev. 1993. Useful online resources include Early English Books Online; University of Pennsylvania's SCETI Furness Shakespeare Library; Michael Best's Internet Shakespeare Editions; and the University of Toronto Early Modern English Dictionaries Database, ed. Ian Lancashire.

Literary Criticism and Theory

Seven volumes of the Cambridge History of Literary Criticism have been published, 1989— : Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical, and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition, 1953; William K. Wimsatt and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, 1957; Rene Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750-1950, 9 vols., 1955-93; Frank Lentricchia, After the Neil Criticism, 1980; Redrawing the Boundaries: The Transformation of English and American Literary Studies, ed. Stephen Greenblatt and Giles Gunn, 1992; and J. Hillis Miller, On Literature, 2002. Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory, 1997. Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden and Martin Kreiswirth, 1994 (also online); Literary Theory, an Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan, 1998; and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent Leitch, 2001.

The following is a selection of books in literary criticism that have been notably influential in shaping modern approaches to English literature and literary forms: Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination, 1950; T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays, 3rd ed. 1951, and On Poetry and Poets, 1957; Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature, 1953; William Empson, Some Versions of Pastoral, 1935, rpt. 1986, and Seven Types of Ambiguity, 3rd ed. 1953; William K. Wimsatt, The Verbal Icon, 1954; Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism, 1957; Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction, 1961, rev. ed. 1983; W.J. Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet, 1970; Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence, 1973; Paul de Man, Allegories of Reading, 1979; and Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class?: The Authority of Interpretive Communities, 1980.

Rene Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature, rev. 1970, is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction, 1997, discusses recurrent issues and debates. See also Terry Eagleton, After Theory, 2003. Modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination, 1975; Ellen Moers, Literary Women, 1976; Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own, 1977; and Sandra Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic, 1979. More recent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis, 1982; Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics, 1987; Sandra Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century, 2 vols., 1988-89; Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference, 1989; Judith Butler, Gender Trouble, 1990; and the critical views sampled in Elaine Showalter, The New Feminist Criticism, 1985; Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton, 2nd ed., 1995; and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl, 2nd ed. 1997. Gay and lesbian studies and criticism are represented in The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michele Barale, and David Halperin, 1993, and by such books as Eve Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosexual Desire, 1985, and Epistemology of the Closet, 1990; Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference, 1989; Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition, 1998; and David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality, 2002.

Convenient introductions to structuralist literary criticism include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction, 1974, and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics, 1975. The poststructuralist challenges to this approach are discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction, 1982; Fredric Jameson, Post-structuralism; or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism, 1991; John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics, 1991; and Beyond Structuralism, ed. Wendell Harris, 1996. For Marxism, see Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Smith, 1971; Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature, 1977; Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act, 1981; and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction, 1983. New historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse, 1990; in the essays collected in The New Historicism, ed. Harold Veveser, 1989, and New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J.

Reynolds, 1993; and in Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism, 2000. The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism, 1983; D. F. McKenzie, Bibliography and Sociology of Texts, 1986; Roger Chartier, The Order of Books, 1994; and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham, 1995. Characteristic of new historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation extended still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During, 1993, and A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan, 1997. This expansion of the field is similarly reflected in postcolonial studies: see The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths, and Helen Tiffin, 1995, and such influential books as Ranajit Guha and Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, Selected Subaltern Studies, 1988; Edward Said, Culture and Imperialism, 1993; Homi Bhabha, The Location of Culture, 1994; Anne McClintock, Imperial Leather: Race, Gender, and Sexuality in the Colonial Contest, 1995; and Jonathan Goldberg, Tempest in the Caribbean, 2004.

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge, 1988, and Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schlieffer, rev. 1998.

THE MIDDLE AGES

Scholarship during this era has been divided into the same three periods as in the General Introduction: Anglo-Saxon Literature, Anglo-Norman Literature, and Middle English Literature of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries. A reference book for the whole era is Joseph Strayer et al., Dictionary of the Middle Ages, 1982-.

Anglo-Saxon Literature

D. Whitelock, The Beginnings of English Society, 1952, provides concise historical background for the literature of the period. The most detailed history is F. M. Stenton's authoritative Anglo-Saxon England, 3rd ed., 1971. Also highly informative are P. Hunter Blair, An Introduction to Anglo-Saxon England, 1956, and Roman Britain and Early England, 55 B.C.-A.D. 871, 1963. The classic study of the culture of the primitive Germanic peoples is H. M. Chadwick, The Heroic Age, 1912. For the later period, see R. Bartlett, The Making of Europe: Conquest, Colonization, and Cultural Change, 950-1350. For those who wish to sample basic historical documents of the period, there is available the translation by G. N. Garmonsway of The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, 1953. The Age of Bede, ed. D. H. Farmer, rev. 1983, and Alfred the Great, ed. S. Keynes and M. Lapidge, 1983, contain texts documenting two crucial periods of Anglo-Saxon history. Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People is translated and edited by B. Colgrave and R.A.B. Mynors, 1969. For studies of Bede, see G. H. Brown, Bede, the Venerable, 1987, and J. M. Wallace-Hadrill, Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People: A Historical Commentary, 1993. A lavishly and finely illustrated introduction to Anglo-Saxon England is The Anglo-Saxons, ed. J. Campbell, 1982. C. Fell, Women in Anglo-Saxon England, 1984, is pertinent to women's studies. The journal Anglo-Saxon England is devoted to all aspects of the history and culture of the period.

All the surviving poetry in Old English is contained in the six volumes edited by G. P. Krapp and E.V.K. Dobbie, The Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records, 1931-53, but the absence of glossaries makes this edition difficult for nonspecialists. Excellent texts of the shorter poems translated in this anthology are contained in J. C. Pope, Eight Old English Poems, 3rd ed., rev. R. D. Fulk, 2001. The standard text of Beowulf and the Fight of Finnsburg is F. Klaeber's 3rd ed., 1950; C. L. Wrenn's edition, Beowulf, with the Finnsburg Fragment, rev. W. F. Bolton, 1973, rev. 1988, is very useful; H. D. Chickering Jr. has made a dual-language edition with extensive commentary, and G. B. Jack has prepared Beowulf: A Student Edition, 1994. There are individual editions of The Dream of the Rood by M. Swanton, 1970; of The Wanderer by T. P. Dunning and A.J. Bliss, 1969. The Wanderer and The Wife's Lament are included in The Old English Elegies: A Critical Edition and Genre Study, ed. A. L. Klinck, 1992. Judith has been edited by M. Griffith, 1997. Modern English translations of many of the Old English poems have been published under various titles by R. K. Gordon, C. W. Kennedy, M. Alexander, S.A.J. Bradley, and K. Crossley-Holland. Many translations of Beowulf are available. E. T. Donaldson's translation is used in Beowulf, A Norton Critical Edition, ed. J. F. Tuso, 1975.

General discussions of Old English literature will be found in Vol. 1 of the Cambridge History of English Literature, S. B. Greenfield and D. G. Calder, New Critical History of Old English Literature, 1986; C. L. Wrenn, A Study of Old English Literature, 1967; M. Alexander, Old English Literature, 1983; and The Cambridge Companion to Old English Literature, ed. M. Godden and M. Lapidge, 1991.

Some useful studies and collections devoted exclusively to Old English poetry are S. B. Greenfield, The Interpretation of Old English Poems, 1972; T. A. Shippey, Old English Verse, 1972; J. B. Bessinger Jr. and S. J. Kahrl, Essential Articles for the Study of Old English Poetry, 1977; D. A. Pearsall, Old and Middle English Poetry, 1977; B. C. Raw, The Art and Background of Old English Poetry, 1978; Old English Poetry: Essays on Style, ed. D. G. Calder, 1979; The Old English Elegies, ed. M. Green, 1983; S. B. Greenfield, Hero and Exile: The Art of Old English Poetry, 1989; De Gustibus, ed. J. M. Foley et al., 1992; Heroic Poetry in the Anglo-Saxon Period, ed. H. Damico and J. Leyerle, 1993; Companion to Old English Poetry, ed. H. Aertsen and R. H. Bremmer Jr., 1994; and Old English Shorter Poems: Basic Readings, ed. K. O'Brien O'Keefe, 1994.

General collections of essays on Old English literature include Old English Literature in Context, ed. J. D. Niles, 1980; Literature and Learning in Anglo-Saxon England, ed. M. Lapidge and H. Gneuss, 1985; Modes of Interpretation in Old English Literature, ed. P. R. Brown et al., 1986; F. C. Robinson, The Tomb of Beowulf and Other Essays on Old English, 1993; and Studies in English Language and Literature, ed. M. J. Toswell and E. M. Tyler, 1996.

Some studies of special topics in Old English literature are J. Chance, Woman as Hero in Old English Literature, 1986; New Readings on Women in Old English Literature, ed. Helen Damico and A. H. Olsen, 1990; A. J. Frantzen, Desire for Origins: New Language, Old English, and Teaching the Tradition, 1990; The Battle of Maldon AD 991, ed. D. Scragg, 1991; Class and Gender in Early English Literature, ed. B. J. Harwood and G. R. Overing, 1994; and Holy Men, Holy Women: Old English Prose Saints' Lives and Their Contexts, ed. P. Szarmach, 1996.

Beowulf

Essential backgrounds to the study of the poem are provided by R. W. Chambers, Beowulf: An Introduction to the Study of the Poem, 3rd ed., with a supplement by C. L. Wrenn, 1959; and a wide-ranging overview of Beowulf scholarship is furnished by A Beowulf Handbook, ed. R. E. Bjork and J. D. Niles, 1997; and by A. Orchard, A Critical Companion to Beowulf, 2003. Important critical studies of the poem are found in D. Whitelock, The Audience of Beowulf, 1951; A. G. Brodeur, The Art of Beowulf, 1959; E. B. Irving Jr., A Reading of Beowulf, 1968, Introduction to Beowulf, 1969, and Rereading Beowulf, 1990; T. A. Shippey, Beowulf, 1978; J. D. Niles, Beowulf: The Poem and Its Tradition, 1983; F. C. Robinson, Beowulf and the Appositive Style, 1985; G. Clark, Beowulf 1990; J. W. Earl, Thinking about Beowulf, 1994; J. M. Hill, The Cultural World in Beowulf, 1995; and C. R. Davis, Beowulf and the Demise of Germanic Legend in England, 1996.

For anthologies of criticism, see The Beowulf Poet, ed. D. K. Fry, 1968; Beowulf, A Norton Critical Edition, ed. Nicholas Howe, 2001 (prose); and Beowulf, A Norton Critical Edition, ed. Daniel Donoghue, 2001 (verse); Interpretations of Beowulf, ed. R. D. Fulk, 1991; and Beowulf: Basic Readings, ed. P. S. Baker, 1995. Special mention should be made of J. R. R. Tolkien's famous lecture, Beowulf, the Monsters and the Critics, 1937, reprinted in the anthologies of Donoghue, Fry, and Fulk.

Anglo-Norman Literature

For accounts of the Norman conquest and its historical consequences, see F. M. Powicke, The Thirteenth Century, 1216-1307, 1953; C. Brooke, From Alfred to Henry III, 871-1272, 2 vols., 1961; R. A. Brown, The Normans, 1984; A. L. Poole, From Domesday Book to Magna Carta, 1955; P. Stafford, A Political and Social History of England in the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries, 1989; M. T. Clanchy, England and Its Riders, 1066-1272, 2nd ed., 1998; and J. Gillingham, The English in the Twelfth Century: Imperialism, National Identity and Political Values, 2000. The Peterborough Chronicle, a continuation of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle to the year 1154, relates events from the point of view of English monks and can be read in translation in The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: a Revised Translation, ed. by D. Whitelock with D. C. Douglas and S. I. Tucker, 1961, rev. 1965.

Studies of historical writing within the period itself, including the legendary histories of the kings of Britain, are J. S. P. Tatlock, The Legendary History of Britain, 1950; R. W. Hanning, The Vision of History in Early Britain: From Gildas to Geoffrey of Monmouth, 1966; and M. Otter, Inventiones: Fiction and Referentiality in Twelfth-Century Historical Writing, 1996.

The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. D. Wallace, 1999, contains many chapters of relevance to this period.

On Geoffrey of Monmouth, in addition to the texts mentioned above, see the translation of his History of the Kings of Britain by Lewis Thorpe, 1966; R. W. Leckie Jr., Title Passage of Dominion: Geoffrey of Monmouth and the Periodization of Insular History in the Twelfth Century, 1981; and M. J. Curley, Geoffrey of Monmouth, 1994. The Brut of Layamon is available in translations by D. G. Bzdył, 1989; Rosamund Allen, 1992; and in an edition of the Middle English text with facing translation, notes, and commentary by W. R. J. Barron and S. C. Weinberg, 1989. The Arthurian sections of Wace's Roman de Brut, translated by Judith Weiss, and of Layamon in Allen's translation are printed together as The Life of King Arthur, 1997.

M. D. Legge, Anglo-Norman Literature and Its Background, 1963, is the standard history. The lais of Marie de France have been translated by R. H. Hanning and J. Ferrante, 1978, and by G. S. Burgess and K. Busby, 1986. For background and critical interpretations of Marie de France's works, see E. J. Mickel, Marie de France, 1974; P. M. Clifford, Marie de France, Lais, 1982; and G. S. Burgess, The Lais of Marie de France, 1987.

R. M. Wilson's Early Middle English Literature focuses primarily on this period. Vol. 1 of the Oxford History of English Literature, by J. A. W. Bennett and D. Gray, Middle English Literature, 1986, which goes up to 1400 (exclusive of Chaucer), contains excellent discussions of early Middle English texts. So too does E. Salter, English and International, 1988. Selections of texts from this era with a valuable introduction to the language and annotations are contained in the anthology edited by J. A. W. Bennett and G. V. Smithers, Early Middle English Verse and Prose, 2nd ed., 1968. The Ancrene Rhvle (Anchoresses' rule) is available in a modern translation by Mary Salu, 1963, and another by H. White, 1993. For a study of the work, called by its variant title Ancrene Wisse (Anchoresses' guide), and related early Middle English texts, see B. Millett with G. B. Jack and Y. Wada, Ancrene Wisse, the Katherine Group, and the Wooing Group, 1996. For a fine essay on the language and culture of the work, see J. R. R. Tolkien, "Ancrene Wisse and Hali Meidenhad" in Essays and Studies, 14.104-26, 1929. See also the commentary in Medieval English Prose for Women, ed. B. Millett and J. Wogan-Browne, 1990, from which the translation printed in this anthology is taken.

Translations of Old Irish literature are available by T. Kinsella in The Tain from the Irish Epic Tain Bo Cuailnge, 1969, from which Exile of the Sons of Uisliu is taken, and by Jeffrey Gantz, Early Irish Myths and Sagas, 1981. For background, see K. H. Jackson, The Oldest Irish Tradition: A Window on the Iron Age, 1964; K. McCone, Pagan Past and Christian Present in Early Irish Literature, 1990; and J. E. Caerwyn Williams and P. K. Ford, The Irish Literary Tradition, 1992.

For medieval Welsh literature see P. K. Ford's translation, The Mahinogi and Other Medieval Welsh Tales, 1977. Jeffrey Gantz has also translated the Mahinogion, 1976, with a useful introduction, bibliography, and commentary on individual selections. On Welsh literature in general, see K. Jackson, Language and History in Early Britain, 1953, and A Guide to Welsh Literature, vol. 1, ed. A. O. H. Jarman and G. R. Hughes, 1976. Specific commentary on the Mahinogion may be found in S. Davies, The Four Branches of The Mahinogi, 1993; C. Matthews, Mahon and the Mysteries of Britain: An Exploration of The Mahinogion, 1987; P. MacCana, The Mahinogi, 1992; and W. J. Gruffydd, Folklore and Myth in The Mahinogion, 1994.

For discussions of the Arthurian materials in Geoffrey of Monmouth, Wace, Marie de France, Layamon, and the Mahinogi, see chaps. 4 and 8 to 11 in Arthurian Literature in the Middle Ages, ed. R. S. Loomis, 1959.

Middle English Literature of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries

Histories of the period include G. Holmes, The Later Middle Ages, 1272-1485, 1962; M. McKisack, The Fourteenth Century, 1307-99, 1959; and E. F. Jacob, The Fifteenth Century, 1961. Accounts of life and society during this period are provided by B. W. Tuchman, A Distant Mirror: The Calamitous Fourteenth Century, 1978; M. Keen, English Society in the Later Middle Ages, 1990; and Fifteenth Century Attitudes, ed. R. Horrox, 1994. See also the picture books listed under Chaucer. J. Huizinga has written a famous account of the culture and spirit of the late fourteenth to fifteenth centuries, formerly translated as The Waning of the Middle Ages, 1924, now available in a fuller text under the more accurate title, The Autumn of the Middle Ages, trans. R. J. Payton and U. Mammitzsch, 1996. F. R. H. Du Boulay complements and qualifies Huizinga in An Age of Ambition, 1970. Chaps. 6 to 10 in E. Auerbach's Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature, trans. by W. R. Trask, 1953, although it does not deal with works in this anthology, gives penetrating insights into the reading of medieval texts. C. S. Lewis, The Discarded Image: An Introduction to Medieval and Renaissance Literature, 1964, seeks to restore for modern readers the perspective and sensibilities of the earlier age. For the religious sensibility of late medieval England see E. Duffy, The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England c. 1400-c. 1580, 1992.

For general discussion of late Middle English literature, see the The Oxford History of English Literature: J. A. W. Bennett and D. Gray, Middle English Literature, 1986, vol. 1, part 2 (up to 1400, exclusive of Chaucer); D. A. Pearsall, Old and Middle English Poetry, 1977; J. A. Burrow, Middle English Literature and Its Background, 1982; D. S. Brewer, English Gothic Literature, 1983; Middle English Prose: A Critical Guide to Major Authors and Genres, ed. A. S. G. Edwards, 1984; A. C. Spearing, Medieval to Renaissance in English Poetry, 1985; The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. D. Wallace, 1999; and J. Simpson, Reform and Cultural Revolution, 2002.

Critical works devoted to more than one author or genre in the period are J. A. Burrow, Ricardian Poetry: Chaucer, Goiter, Langland, and the Gawain Poet, 1971; C. Muscatine, Poetry and Crisis in the Age of Chaucer, 1972; A. C. Spearing, Medieval Dream Poetry, 1976, Readings in Medieval Poetry, 1987; T. Turville-Petre, The Alliterative Revival, 1977; Medieval Literature: Chaucer and the Alliterative Tradition, vol. I of The New Pelican Guide to English Literature, ed. Boris Ford, 1982; Fifteenth-Century Studies: Recent Essays, ed. R. F. Yeager, 1984; Medieval English Poetry, ed. S. Trigg, 1993; D. Despres, Ghostly Sights: Visual Meditation in Late-Medieval Literature, 1989; G. Margherita, The Romance of Origins: Language and Sexual Difference in Middle English Literature, 1994; and The Long Fifteenth Century: Essays for Douglas Gray, ed. H. Cooper and S. Mapstone, 1997.

For the Middle English language, see Helge Kokeritz, A Guide to Chaucer's Pronunciation, 1954; David Burnley, A Guide to Chaucer's Language, 1983; and J. A. Burrow and T. Turville-Petre, A Book of Middle English, 1996.

The standard bibliography is A Manual of the Writings in Middle English, 1050-1500, 6 vols., ed. J. B. Severs, A. E. Hartung, et al., 1967-80, which is based on and supersedes the Manual of J. E. Wells, 1916, with nine supplements through 1945.

Geoffrey Chaucer

The standard edition of Chaucer's writing is The Riverside Chaucer, 3rd ed., ed. L. D. Benson et al., 1987, based on F. N. Robinson's edition. E. Talbot Donaldson, Chaucer's Poetry, 2nd ed., 1975, from which are taken the selections printed here, is helpful to the nonspecialist, as are John H. Fisher, The Complete Poetry and Prose of Geoffrey Chaucer, 2nd ed., 1989, and V. A. Kolve and Glending Olson, The Canterbury Tales: Nine Tales and The "General Prologue," Norton Critical Edition, 1989. Vivid presentations of Chaucer in the background of fourteenth-century England are found in D. S. Brewer, Chaucer and His World, 1978, which is beautifully illustrated, and A New Introduction to Chaucer, 2nd ed., 1998. Pictorial companions to Chaucer's works, especially the Canterbury Tales, include R. S. Loomis, A Mirror of Chaucer's World, 1965, Maurice Hussey, Chaucer's World, 1967, Ian Serrailier, Chaucer and His World, 1968, and Roger Hart, English Life in Chaucer's Day, 1973.

The raw material for Chaucer's biography is contained in Chaucer Life-Records, ed. M. M. Crow and C. C. Olson, 1966. D. R. Howard, Chaucer: His Life, His Works, His World, 1987, and D. A. Pearsall, The Life of Geoffrey Chaucer, 1992, contain extensive background and interpretation. For succinct accounts of the sources and literary background of Chaucer's works, see R. D. French, A Chaucer Handbook, 2nd ed., 1947; reproductions of many of the known sources of the Canterbury Tales are contained in Sources and Analogues of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, ed. W. F. Bryan and Germaine Dempster, 1941, 1958. See also the updated Sources and Analogues of the Canterbury Tales, vol. 1, ed. R. M. Correale and M. Hamel, 2002. Useful literary materials are collected in R. P. Miller, Chaucer: Sources and Backgrounds, 1977. Muriel Bowden, A Commentary on the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales, 1948, provides a wealth of background information on the individual Canterbury pilgrims; see also Jill Mann, Chaucer and Medieval Estates Satire, 1973. Various aspects of Chaucer's work are treated by a number of scholars in Chaucer and Chaucerians, ed. D. S. Brewer, 1966; Geoffrey Chaucer (Writers and Their Background), ed. D. S. Brewer, 1974; Companion to Chaucer Studies, ed. Beryl Rowland, rev. 1979; A Companion to Chaucer, ed. P. Brown, 2000; and The Cambridge Chaucer Companion, ed. Piero Boitani and Jill Mann, rev. 2003.

For literary criticism on and context for both The Canterbury Tales and other works by Chaucer, the following contain stimulating discussions: G. L. Kittredge, Chaucer and His Poetry, 1915; J. L. Lowes, Geoffrey Chaucer and the Development of His Genius, 1934; C. Muscatine, Chaucer and the French Tradition, 1957; R. O. Payne, The Key of Remembrance, 1963; M. Hussey, A. C. Spearing, and J. Winny, An Introduction to Chaucer, 1965; E. T. Donaldson, Speaking of Chaucer, 1970; T. Ross, Chaucer's Bawdy, 1972; D. S. Brewer, Chaucer, 3rd ed., 1973; P. Elbow, Oppositions in Chaucer, 1975; A. David, The Strumpet Muse: Art and Morals in Chaucer's Poetry, 1976; R. Burlin, Chaucerian Fiction, 1977; D. Burnley, Chaucer's Language and the Philosophers' Tradition, 1979; A. J. Minnis, Chaucer and Pagan Antiquity, 1982; G. Kane, Chaucer, 1984; S. Knight, Geoffrey Chaucer, 1986; A. Astell, Chaucer and the Universe of Learning, 1996; D. Wallace, Chaucerian Polity: Absolutist Lineages and Associational Forms in England and Italy, 1997; and R. P. McGerr, Chaucer's Open Book: Resistance to Closure in Medieval Discourse, 1998.

Criticism that deals mainly with The Canterbury Tales and with earlier commentary on it includes P. Ruggiers, The Art of The Canterbury Tales, 1964; D. R. Howard, The Idea of The Canterbury Tales, 1976; T. Lawler, The One and the Many in The Canterbury Tales, 1980; H. Cooper, The Structure of the Canterbury Tales, 1983; D. Pearsall, The Canterbury Tales, 1985; C. D. Benson, Chaucer's Drama of Style: Poetic Variety in The Canterbury Tales, 1986; W. Wetherbee, Geoffrey Chaucer: The Canterbury Tales, 1989; H. M. Leicester Jr., The Disenchanted Self: Representing the Subject in The Canterbury Tales, 1990; S. Crane, Gender and Romance in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, 1994; and H. Cooper, The Canterbury Tales, Oxford Guides to Chaucer, 2nd ed., 1996.

D. W. Robertson's A Preface to Chaucer, 1962, is a learned and stimulating introduction to the reading of Chaucer in the light of medieval aesthetic doctrines. V. A. Kolve, Chaucer and the Imagery of Narrative, 1984, relates the first five of the Canterbury Tales to medieval art. Several recent books stress the importance of oral delivery, performance, and storytelling in the Canterbury Tales: Betsy Bowden, Chaucer Aloud, 1987; Carl Lindahl, Earnest Games: Folkloric Patterns in The Canterbury Tales, 1987; L. M. Koff, Chaucer and the Art of Storytelling, 1988; and J. M. Ganim, Chaucerian Theatricality, 1990. The following studies relate Chaucer's works to their social and historical background: Paul Strohm, Social Chaucer, 1989; Peggy Knapp, Chaucer and the Social Contest, 1990; Peter Brown and Andrew Butcher, The Age of Saturn: Literature and History in The Canterbury Tales, 1991; and Lee Patterson, Chaucer and the Subject of History, 1991. A pioneer feminist study of Chaucer is Carolyn Dinshaw, Chaucer's Sexual Poetics, 1989; see also J. Mann, Geoffrey Chaucer, rev. 1991; and E. T. Hansen, Chaucer and the Fictions of Gender, 1992.

The following are collections of critical essays: Discussions of The Canterbury Tales, ed. C. J. Owen, 1961; Geoffrey Chaucer: A Critical Anthology, ed. J. A. Burrow, 1969; and Geoffrey Chaucer Contemporary Studies in Literature, ed. G. D. Economou, 1975; Chaucer's Religious Tales, ed. C. D. Benson and E. Robertson, 1990; and Critical Essays on Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, ed. M. Andrew, 1991. See also the prefatory remarks on individual works and tales in The Riverside Chaucer and the commentary in E. Talbot Donaldson's anthology, cited above.

For Chaucer's writing outside the Canterbury Tales, see B. A. Windeatt, Oxford Guides to Chaucer: Troilus and Criseyde, 1992; and A. J. Minnis, Oxford Guides to Chaucer: The Shorter Poems, 1995.

Perhaps the most reliable glossary is that edited by Norman Davis et al., 1979. The standard bibliographies are E. P. Hammond, Chaucer: A Bibliographical Manual, 1908; D. D. Griffith, Bibliography of Chaucer, 1955; W. R. Crawford, 1954-63, 1967; L. Y. Baird, 1964-73, 1977; and L. Y. Baird-Lange and H. Schnutgen, 1974-85, 1988. Two very useful annotated bibliographies are by Mark Allen and J. H. Fisher, The Essential Chaucer, 1987, and John Leyerle and Anne Quick, Chaucer: A Bibliographical Introduction, 1986. Studies in the Age of Chaucer, the journal of The New Chaucer Society publishes a current bibliography as well as articles on Chaucer and other medieval literature. See also Caroline Spurgeon, Five Hundred Years of Chaucer Criticism and Allusion, 1357-1900, 1925.

Everyman

See entries under Mystery Plays; Everyman.

John Gower

The authoritative text is The English Works of John Gower, ed. G. C. Macaulay, 2 vols., 1900; a student edition has been published: Confessio Amantis, ed. R. A. Peck, vol. 1, 2000. For focused studies, see K. Olsson, John Gower and the Structures of Conversion: A Reading of the Confessio Amantis, 1992; and J. Simpson, Sciences and the Self in Medieval Poetry, 1995. See also the collection Gower's Confessio Amantis: Responses and Reassessments, ed. A. J. Minnis, 1983.

Robert Henryson

The Poems of Robert Henryson, ed. D. Fox, 1980 and 1987, is the standard edition. The Moral Fables of Aesop, ed. G. D. Copen, 1987, has a facing page prose translation. For background and criticism, see J. MacQueen, Robert Henryson: A Study of the Major Poems, 1967, and D. Gray, Robert Henryson, 1979.

Julian of Norwich

The standard Middle English text with a wealth of commentary is A Book of Showings to the anchoress Jidian of Norwich, 2 vols., ed. Edmund Colledge and James Walsh, 1978. The editors' translation is published as Jidian of Norwich: Showings, 1978; another translation of the long text by Clifton Walters is published under the title Revelations of Divine Love, 1966. Both long and short text are translated in Jidian of Norwich: Revelations of Divine Love, trans. E. Spearing, 1998. Another edition of the long text, ed. G. R. Crampton, 1994, published for TEAMS (Consortium for the Teaching of the Middle Ages) is designed for students. See also the Norton Critical Edition.

General studies of mystical writing in England and on the Continent are W. Riehle, The Middle English Mystics, trans. B. Standring, 1981; An Introduction to the Medieval Mystics of Europe, ed. P. Szarmach, 1984; A. K. Warren, Anchors and their Patrons in Medieval England, 1985; F. Beer, Women and Mystical Experience in the Middle Ages, 1992; S. Beckwith, Christ's Body: Identity, Culture, and Society in Late Medieval Writings, 1993; M. Glasscoe, English Medieval Mystics: Games of Faith, 1993; and D. Aers and L. Staley, The Powers of the Holy: Religion, Politics, and Gender in Late Medieval English Culture, 1996. Studies helpful to understanding the mystical thought of Julian of Norwich are B. Pelphrey, Christ Our Mother, 1989, and D. N. Baker, Julian of Norwich's Showing: From Vision to Book, 1994.

Margery Kempe

The standard Middle English text of The Book of Margery Kempe is that of B. A. Windeatt, 2000. Another edition, ed. L. Staley, 1996, for TEAMS (Consortium for the Teaching of Middle English) is designed for students. Barry Windeatt has made a translation, 1985, with notes and a helpful introduction. See also the Norton Critical Edition. For general studies of mystical writings, see under Julian of Norwich. Studies of Kempe are C. W. Atkinson, Mystic and Pilgrim: The Book and the World of Margery Kempe, 1983; K. Lochrie, Margery Kempe and Translations of the Flesh, 1991; Margery Kempe: A Book of Essays, S. McEntire, ed., 1992; and L. S. Johnson, Margery Kempe's Dissenting Fictions, 1994. Gibson, cited under Mystery Plays, provides background on Kempe's region and includes a chapter on Kempe.

William Langland

The most handy edition is A. V. C. Schmidt, The Vision of Piers Plowman: A Complete Edition of the B-Text, 1978. W. W. Skeat, The Vision of William Concerning Piers the Plowman . . ., 2 vols., 1886, gives all three versions side by side; the commentary and notes in volume 2 remain invaluable. The Athlone edition, based on all extant manuscripts, has the A text, ed. G. Kane, 1960, the B text, ed. Kane and E. T. Donaldson, 1975, and the C text, ed. Kane and G. H. Russell, 1997. J. A. W. Bennett's edition of the first eight passus of the B text, 1972, is very useful, as is D. A. Pearsall's edition of the C text, 1978. The selections here are taken from E. T. Donaldson's Piers Plowman: An Alliterative Verse Translation, 1990. A Companion to Piers Plowman, ed. J. A. Alford, 1988, has essays and extensive bibliographies on many aspects of the poem. Book-length studies helpful to the student as well as the specialist include R. W. Frank, Piers Plowman and the Scheme of Salvation, 1957; Elizabeth Salter, Piers Plowman: An Introduction, 1962; E. D. Kirk, The Dream Thought of Piers Plowman, 1972; David Aers, Piers Plowman and Christian Allegory, 1975; James Simpson, Piers Plowman: An Introduction to the B-Text, 1990; J. A. Burrow, Langland's Fictions, 1993; S. Justice, Writing and Rebellion: England in 1381, 1994; and J. Wittig, William Langland Revisited, 1997. Collections of critical essays have been made by S. Justice and K. Kerby-Fulton, eds., Written Work: Langland, Labour and Authorship, 1997; and K. M. Hewett-Smith, ed., William Langland's Piers Plowman: A Book of Essays, 2001. Useful background material has been collected by Jeanne Krochalis and Edward Peters in The World of Piers Plowman, 1975. F. R. H. DuBoulay, The England of Piers Plowman, 1991, places the poem in its historical and cultural setting.

Sir Thomas Malory

The Winchester manuscript of Malory's Morte Darthur, with full commentary and valuable discussion, is given in Eugene Vinaver's The Works of Sir Thomas Malory, 3 vols., 2nd ed., 1967, rev. P. J. C. Field, 1990; the one-volume edition, 2nd ed., Oxford, 1970, contains the text only. See also Le Morte Darthur, 2003, ed. S. H. A. Shepherd. The Caxton version is most readily available in Caxtons Malory, ed. J. W. Spisak, 1983. Vinaver, Malory, 1929, surveys Malory's life and career; see also, P. J. C. Field, The Life and Times of Sir Thomas Malory, 1993. Guides to Malory are B. Dillon, A Malory Handbook, 1978; Terence McCarthy, An Introduction to Malory, rev. ed., 1991; and E. Archibald and A. S. G. Edwards, A Companion to Malory, 1996. A number of critical problems in Malory's work, especially its unity, are discussed in three collections of essays by various scholars: Essays on Malory, ed. J. A. W. Bennett, 1963, Malory's Originality, ed. by R. M. Lumianski, 1964, and Studies in Malory, ed. J. W. Spisak, 1985. Other studies of Malory and the Morte Darthur include Mark Lambert, Malory: Style and Vision in Le Morte Darthur, 1975; L. D. Benson, Malory's Morte Darthur, 1976; and Felicity Riddy, Sir Thomas Malory, 1987.

For reference books and discussions of the development and of the political and social significance of the Arthurian tradition in England, see R. S. Loomis, The Development of Arthurian Romance, 1963; S. Knight, Arthurian Literature and Society, 1983; The Arthurian Handbook, ed. N. J. Lacy and G. Ashe, 2nd ed., 1998; The Neiv Artlmirian Encyclopedia, ed. N. J. Lacy, 1991; Approaches to Teaching the Arthurian Tradition, ed. M. Fries and J. Watson, 1992; Culture and the King: the Social Implications of the Arthurian Legend, ed. M. Schichtman and J. Carley, 1994; Arthurian Women: A Casebook, ed. T. Fenster, 1996; King Arthur: A Casebook, ed. E. D. Kennedy, 1996; and Patricia Ingham, Sovereign Fantasies: Arthurian Romance and the Making of Britain, 2001.

Middle English Lyrics

The best selections of Middle English lyrics are Medieval English Lyrics: A Critical Anthology, ed. R. T. Davies, 1963; Middle English Lyrics, A Norton Critical Edition, ed. M. S. Luria and R. L. Hoffman, 1974; The Oxford Book of Medieval English Verse, ed. Celia and Kenneth Sisam, 1970; English Lyrics before 1500, ed. Theodore Silverstein, 1971. For criticism see A. K. Moore, The Secular Lyric in Middle English, 1951; Kane's chapter in Middle English Literature; Stephen Manning, Wisdom and Number, 1962; Rosemary Woolf, The English Religious Lyric in the Middle Ages, 1968; and D. Gray, Themes and Images in the Medieval English Religious Lyric, 1972.

For general studies of English and Continental lyric poetry, see P. Dronke, The Medieval Lyric, 3rd ed., 1996, and Vox Feminae: Studies in Medieval Woman's Song, ed. J. F. Plummer, 1981.

Mystery Plays; Everyman

Good selections of Middle English plays are presented by A. C. Cawley, Everyman and Medieval Miracle Plays, 1960; by D. M. Bevington, Medieval Drama, 1975; and by Peter Happe, The English Mystery Plays, 1975. Cawley, The Wakefield Pageants in the Towneley Cycle, 1958, has a discussion of the work of the "Wakefield Master" whose hand is seen in the Second Shepherds' Play.

E. K. Chambers's classic The Medieval Stage, 1905, remains a mine of information, although its views about the evolution of medieval drama are no longer accepted. A new understanding and appreciation of medieval drama begins with O. B. Hardison, Christian Rite and Christian Drama in the Middle Ages, 1965; and for the mysteries, with V. A. Kolve, The Play Called Corpus Christi, 1966. Rosemary Woolf, The English Mystery Plays, 1972, makes detailed comparisons among the extant plays. Individual cycles are studied by Peter Travis in Dramatic Design in the Chester Cycle, 1982, by Martin Stevens in Four Middle English Mystery' Cycles: Textual, Contextual, and Critical Interpretations, 1987; and by S. Beckwith, Signifying God: Social Relation and Symbolic Act in the York Corpus Christi Plays, 2001. G. M. Gibson fills in the social and religious background in The Theater of Devotion: East Anglian Drama and Society in the Late Middle Ages, 1989. Collections of critical and/or introductory essays can be found in the following: Medieval English Drama, ed. J. Taylor and A. H. Nelson, 1972; Contexts for Early English Drama, ed. M. Briscoe and J. Col-dewey, 1989; and The Cambridge Companion to Medieval English Theatre, ed. R. Beadle, 1994. Approaches to Teaching Medieval Drama, ed. Richard Emmerson, 1990, contains essays by many hands and makes up a nontechnical survey of current opinion. For commentary on Everyman, see the introduction to A. C. Cawley's 1961 edition and Robert Potter's comprehensive The English Morality Play: Origins, History, and Influence of a Dramatic Tradition, 1975.

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight

The standard Middle English edition of the poem is by J. R. R. Tolkien and E. V. Gordon, rev. Norman Davis, 1967. Easier to use are the editions by R. A. Waldron, 1970, rev. for The Poems of the Pearl Manuscript, 1978; and by J. A. Burrow, 1972. For a guide to the poems in the manuscript, see A. Putter, An Introduction to the Gawain-Poet, 1996, and A Companion to the Gawain Poet, ed. D. S. Brewer and J. Gibson, 1997. Discussions of various aspects of the poem appear in Marie Borroff, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: A Stylistic and Metrical Study, 1962; L. D. Benson, Art and Tradition in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 1965; J. A. Burrow, A Reading of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 1965; A. C. Spearing, The Gawain Poet: A Critical Study, 1971; and W. Klein, Concepts of Chivalry in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 1984.

Collections of essays have been compiled by R. J. Blanch, Sir Gawain and Pearl, 1966, and Text and Matter: New Critical Perspectives of the Pearl-Poet, 1991. D. Fox, Twentieth-Century Interpretations of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 1968; and D. R. Howard and C. K. Zacher, Critical Studies of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, 1968.

THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY

Some important books on society and culture in early modern England are LawTence Stone, The Crisis of the Aristocracy, 1558—1641, 1965, and The Family, Sex and Marriage in England, 1500-1800, 1979; Keith Thomas, Religion and the Decline of Magic, 1971; P. G. Emmison, Elizabethan Life: Disorder, 1970; David Cressy, Literacy and the Social Order: Reading and Writing in Tudor and Stuart England, 1980, and Birth, Marriage, and Death: Ritual, Religion, and the Life-Cycle in Tudor and Stuart England, 1997; Peter Clark, The English Alehouse: A Social History, 1200-1830, 1983; Peter Laslett, The World We Have Lost, Further Explored, 1984; Paul Slack, The Impact of Plague in Tudor and Stuart England, 1985; J. A. Sharpe, Early Modern England: A Social History, 1987; Susan Amussen, An Ordered Society: Gender and Class in Early Modern England, 1988; Margaret Aston, England's Iconoclasts: Laws Against Images, 1988; Felicity Heal, Hospitality in Early Modern England, 1990; Ian Archer, The Pursuit of Stability: Social Relations in Elizabethan London, 1991; Ronald Hutton, The Rise and Fall of

Merry England: The Ritual Year 1400-1700, 1994; Lena Orlin, Private Matters and Public Culture in Post-Reformation England, 1994; Kim Hall, Things of Darkness: Economies of Race and Gender in Early Modern England, 1995; Lisa Jardine, Worldly Goods: A New History of the Renaissance, 1996; Adam Fox, Oral and Literate Culture in England, 1500-1700, 2000; Ellen Meiskins Wood, The Origin of Capitalism: A Longer View, 2002; and Julian Yates, Error, Misuse, Failure: Object Lessons from the English Renaissance, 2003. Jeffrey L. Singman, Daily Life in Elizabethan England, 1995, provides a wealth of information on topics ranging from sex to bear-baiting.

Useful general studies of the history of the period include; G. R. Elton, Reform and Reformation: England, 1509-1559, 1977; Conrad Russell, The Crisis of Parliaments: English History, 1509-1660, 1971; J. G. A. Pocock, The Machiavellian Moment: Florentine Political Thought and the Atlantic Republican Tradition, 1975; John Guy, Tudor England, 1988; Penny Williams, The Later Tudors: England 1547—

1603, 1995; and Susan Brigdon, New Worlds, Lost Worlds: The Rise of the Tudors, 1485-1603, 2000. Political theory in the period is surveyed in Quentin Skinner, The Foundations of Modern Political Thought, 2 vols., 1978; and there is an important analysis of the theory of kingship in E. H. Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies, 1957. Exploration and military history are treated in G. Mattingly, The Armada, 1959, and J. A. Williamson, The Age of Drake, 4th ed., 1960. For church history and religion, see John Bossy, The English Catholic Community, 1570-1850, 1979; Patrick Collinson, The Religion of Protestants: The Church in English Society, 1559-1625, 1982, and The Birthpangs of Protestant England: Religious and Cultural Change in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, 1988; Peter Lake, Anglicans and Puritans?, 1988; Debora Shuger, Habits of Thought in the English Renaissance: Religion, Politics, and the Dominant Culture, 1990; Eamon Duffy, The Stripping of the Altars: Traditional Religion in England c. 1400-c. 1580, 1992; Christopher Haigh, English Reformations: Religion, Politics, and Society under the Tudors, 1993; James Shapiro, Shakespeare and the Jews, 1996; The Culture of English Puritanism, ed. Christopher Durston and Jacqueline Eales, 1996; The Impact of the English Reformation, 1500-1640, ed. Peter Marshall, 1997; and Ian Green, Print and Protestantism in Early Modern England, 2000.

Life at court is described in David Starkey, The English Court: From the Wars of the Roses to the Civil War, 1987. Patronage and courtiership, with special reference to literature, are analyzed in David Javitch, Poetry and Courtliness in Renaissance England, 1976; Patronage in the Renaissance, ed. Guy Fitch Lytle and Stephen Orgel, 1981; and Frank Whigham, Ambition and Privilege: The Social Tropes of Elizabethan Courtesy Theory, 1984. On publishing and the book trade, see H. S. Bennett, English Books and Readers, 1475-1557, 1952, and English Books and Readers, 1558-1603, 1965; Elizabeth L. A long series of important studies have defined the Renaissance in terms of humanism, imitation of the ancients, and individual achievement: Jacob Burckhardt, The Civilization of the Renaissance, 1878, rev. 1944; Max Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, 1905; Douglas Bush, The Renaissance and English Humanism, 1939; E. M. W.

Tillyard, The Elizabethan World Picture, 1943; The Renaissance Philosophy of Man, ed. Ernst Cassirer et al., 1948; Erwin Panofsky, Renaissance and Resuscitations in Western Art, 2 vols., 1960; R. R. Bolgar, The Classical Heritage and Its Beneficiaries, 1954, rpt. 1973; Paul O. Kristeller, Renaissance Thought, 2 vols., 1961, 1965; D.J. Gordon, The Renaissance Imagination: Essays and Lectures, ed. Stephen Orgel, 1975; Gordon Braden, The Classics and English Renaissance Poetry, 1978; David R. Carlson, English Humanist Books: Writers and Patrons, Manuscript and Print, 1475-1525, 1993; Renaissance Humanism, ed. Jill Kraye, 1996; Jonathan Woolfson, Reassessing Tudor Humanism, 2002. See also The Cambridge History of Renaissance Philosophy, ed. Charles Schmitt, 1988. Revisionist analyses by new historicist and cultural materialist critics focus on the interaction of institutions, ideology, and the conditions of cultural production in the social construction of persons and literary texts. Some seminal studies are Stephen Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning, 1980; Representing the English Renaissance, ed. S. Greenblatt, 1988; Richard Helgerson, Self-Crowned Laureates: Spenser, Jonson, Milton and the Literary System, 1983, and Forms of Nationhood: The Elizabethan Writing of England, 1992; Annabel Patterson, Censorship and Interpretation: The Conditions of Writing and Reading in Early Modern England, 1984; Peter Stallybrass and Allon White, The Politics and Poetics of Transgression, 1986; Patricia Fumerton, Cultural Aesthetics: Renaissance Literature and the Practice of Social Ornament, 1991; Richard Halpern, The Poetics of Primitive Accumulation: English Renaissance Culture and the Genealogy of Capital, 1991; Subject and Object in Renaissance Culture, ed. Margreta de Grazia, Maureen Quilligan, and Peter Stallybrass, 1996; Cyndia Clegg, Press Censorship in Elizabethan England, 1997; and Timothy Reiss, Knowledge, Discovery, and Imagination in Early Modern Europe: The Rise of Aesthetic Rationalism, 1997. (Others on the theater and on Shakespeare are noted in appropriate sections below.)

Science and medicine in this period are discussed in Antonia McLean, Humanism and the Rise of Science in Tudor England, 1972; Roy Porter, Disease, Medicine and Society in England 1550-1860, 1987; Brian Rotman, Signifying Nothing: The Semiotics of Zero, 1987, rpt. 1993; Thomas Laqueur, Making Sex: Body and Gender from the Greeks to Freud, 1990; Jonathan Sawday, The Body Emblazoned: Dissection and the Human Body in Renaissance Culture, 1995; Steven Shapin, The Scientific Revolution, 1996; Wonders and the Order of Nature, 1150-1750, ed. Education is the subject of T. W. Baldwin, William Shakespeare's Small Latine and Lesse Greeke, 2 vols., 1944; Kenneth Charlton, Education in Renaissance England, 1965; and Rebecca Bushnell, A Cidture of Teaching: Early Modern Humanism in Theory and Practice, 1996. On logic and rhetoric see W. S. Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England, 1500—1700, 1956; Sister Miriam Joseph, Rhetoric in Shakespeare's Time, 1962; Frances Yates, The Art of Memory, 1966; Joel Altman, The Tudor Play of Mind: Rhetorical Inquiry and the Development of Elizabethan Drama, 1978; Victoria Kahn, Rhetoric and Skepticism in the Renaissance, 1985; Patricia Parker, Literary Fat Ladies: Rhetoric, Gender, Property, 1987; Debora Shuger, Sacred Rhetoric: The Christian Grand Style in the English Renaissance, 1988; and Wayne Rebhorn, The Emperor of Men's Minds: Literature and the Renaissance Discourse of Rhetoric, 1995.

Some books on Renaissance art and architecture are J. Buxton, Elizabethan Taste, 1963; Roy Strong, The English Icon: Elizabethan and Jacobean Portraiture, 1969, and The Cult of Elizabeth: Elizabethan Portraiture and Pageantry, 1977; Mark Girouard, Life in the English Country House, 1978; Lucy Gent, Picture and Poetry, 1560-1620, 1981; Norman K. Farmer, Poets and the Visual Arts in Renaissance England, 1984; John King, Tudor Royal Iconography: Literature and Art in an Age of Religious Crisis, 1989; Timothy Mowl, Elizabethan and Jacobean Style, 1993; Anthony Wells-Cole, Art and Decoration in Elizabethan and Jacobean England, 1997; and Leonard Barkan, Unearthing the Past: Archeology and Aesthetics in the Making of Renaissance Culture, 1999. Renaissance gardens are treated in Roy Strong, The Renaissance Garden in England, 1979, and Rebecca Bushnell, Green Desire: Imagining Early Modern English Gardens, 2003. Some important studies on civic pageantry include David M. Bergeron, English Civic Pageantry, 1558-1642, 1971, rev. 2003; Gordon Kipling, The Triumph of Honor: Burgundian Origins of the Elizabethan Renaissance, 1977; and Michael D. Bristol, Carnival and Theater: Plebian Culture and the Structure of Authority in Renaissance England, 1985. See also Ann Rosalind Jones and Peter Stallybrass, Renaissance Clothing and the Materials of Memory, 2000. Renaissance iconology and emblem books often illuminate literary imagery; important studies are Erwin Panofsky, Studies in Iconology, 1939;

Rosemary Freeman, English Emblem Books, 1948; Jean Seznec, The Survival of the Pagan Gods, trans. B. F. Sessions, 1963; and John Manning, The Emblem, 2002. The attack on religious images is treated by John Phillips, The Reformation of Images: Destruction of Art in England, 1535-1660, 1971; Ernest B. Gilman, Iconoclasm and Poetry in the English Reformation, 1986; and Iconoclasm, ed. Bruno Latour and Peter Weibel, 2002.

For Tudor music and musicians in relation to poetry see M. C. Boyd, Elizabethan Music and Music Criticism, 1940; E. H. Fellowes, English Madrigal Verse, rev. 1967; John Stevens, Music and Poetry in the Early Tudor Court, 1961, rpt. 1979; David Price, Patrons and Musicians of the English Renaissance, 1981; and Winifred Meynard, Elizabethan Lyric Poetry and Its Music, 1986. John Hollander studies music as symbol in The Untuning of the Sky: Ideas of Music in English Poetry, 1500-1700, 1961; and Paula Johnson analyzes structural affinities of the two art forms in Form and Transformation in Music and Poetry of the English Renaissance, 1975. Other important studies include Linda Phyllis Austern, Music in English Children's Drama of the Later Renaissance, 1992; Bruce Smith, The Acoustic World of Early Modern England: Attending to the O-Factor, 1999; and Marc Berley, After the Heavenly Tune: English Poetry and the Aspiration to Song, 2000.

Useful anthologies of Elizabethan literary criticism are G. G. Smith, Elizabethan Critical Essays, 2 vols., 1904; O. B. Hardison Jr., English Literary Criticism: The Renaissance, 1963; and English Renaissance Literary Criticism, ed. Brian Vickers, 1999. Important studies of Renaissance literary theory and criticism include Rosamond Tuve, Elizabethan and Metaphysical Imagery, 1947; Bernard Weinberg, A History of Literary Criticism in the Italian Renaissance, 2 vols., 1961, rpt. 1974; Baxter Hathaway, Marvels and Commonplaces: Renaissance Literary Criticism, 1968; Don C. Allen, Mysteriously Meant: The Rediscovery of Pagan Symbolism and Allegorical Interpretation in the Renaissance, 1970; Margaret W. Ferguson, Trials of Desire: Renaissance Defenses of Poetry, 1983; Arthur Kinney, Humanist Poetics, 1986; The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism, vol. 3: The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton, 1999; and Robert Matz, Defending Literature in Early Modern England: Renaissance Literary Theory in Social Context, 2000.

Some distinguished historical and critical accounts of Renaissance literature include C. S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century, Excluding Drama, 1954; Douglas Bush, Mythology and the Renaissance Tradition in English Poetry, rev. 1963; Rosalie Colie, The Resources of Kind: Genre-Theory in the Renaissance, 1973; Thomas M. Some important studies of drama in relation to contemporary politics and ideology are David Bevington, Tudor Drama and Politics, 1968; Robert Weiman, Shakespeare and the Popular Tradition in the Theater, 1967, rpt. 1987; Jonas Barish, The Antitheatrical Prejudice, 1981; Jonathan Dollimore, Radical Tragedy: Religion, Ideology and Power in the Drama of Shakespeare and his Contemporaries, 1984; Catherine Belsey, The Subject of Tragedy: Identity and Difference in Renaissance Drama, 1985; Jean-Christophe Agnew, Worlds Apart: The Market and the Theatre in Anglo-American Thought, 1550-1750, 1986; Steven Mullaney, The Place of the Stage, 1988; Leah Marcus, Puzzling Shakespeare: Local Reading and Its Discontents, 1988; Katharine Maus, Inwardness and Theater in the English Renaissance, 1995; Louis Montrose, The Purpose of Playing: Shakespeare and the Cultural Politics of the Elizabethan Theatre, 1996; Janette Dillon, Theatre, Court and City, 1595—1610: Drama and Social Space in London, 2000; Michael O'Connell, The Idolatrous Eye: Iconoclasm and Theater in Early-Modern England, 2000; Jeffrey Knapp, Shakespeare's Tribe: Church, Nation, and Theater in Renaissance England, 2002; Wendy Wall, Staging Domesticity: Household Work and English Identity in Early Modern Drama, 2002; and Jonathan Gil Harris, Sick Economies: Drama, Mercantilism, and Disease in Shakespeare's England, 2004.

The many recent studies of the status of women in early modern England have a distinguished precursor in Alice Clark, Working Life of Women in the Seventeenth Century, 1919. On the situation of women in the Renaissance and the achievements of women writers, see Joan Kelly-Gadol, "Did Women Have a Renaissance?" in Becoming Visible: Women in European History, ed. R. Bridenthal and C. Koonz, 1977; Ian Maclean, The Renaissance Notion of Women, 1980; Beyond Their Sex: Learned Women of the European Past, ed. Patricia H. Labalme, 1980; Retha M. Warnicke, Women of the English Renaissance and Reformation, 1983; Linda Woodbridge, Women and the English Renaissance: Literature and the Nature of Womankind, 1540-1640, 1984; Rewriting the Renaissance: The Discourses of Sexual Difference in Early Modern Europe, ed. Margaret Ferguson et al., 1986; Elaine Beilin, Redeeming Eve: Women Writers of the English Renaissance, 1987; The Renaissance Englishwoman in Print: Counterbalancing the Canon, ed. Anne M. Haselkorn and Betty S. Travitsky, 1990; Constance Jordan, Renaissance Feminism: Literary Texts and Political Models, 1990; Patricia Crawford, Women and Religion in England, 1500-1720, 1993; Silent but for the Word: Tudor Women as Patrons, Translators, and Writers of Religious Works, ed. Margaret Hannay, 1985; Tina Krontiris, Oppositional Voices: Women as Translators of Literature in the English Renaissance, 1992; Women, "Race," and Writing in the Early Modern Period, ed. Margo Henricks and Patricia Parker, 1994; Renaissance Women: A Sourcebook, ed. Kate Aughterson, 1995; Helen Hackett, Women and Literature in Britain, 1500-1700, 1996; Lay by your Needles, Ladies, Take the Pen: Writing Women in England, ed. Kate Chedgoy, Melanie Osborne, and Suzanne Trill, 1997; Sara Mendelson and Patricia Crawford, Women in Early Modern England, 1550-1720, 1998; Natasha Korda, Shakespeare's Domestic Economies: Gender and Property in Early Modern England, 2002; and Mary Beth Rose, Gender and Heroism in Early Modern English Literature, 2002. A useful anthology is The Paradise of Women: Writings by Englishwomen of the Renaissance, ed. Betty Travitsky, 1981; see also Randall Martin, ed., Women Writers in Renaissance England, 1997. Recent studies of women writers in Tudor England are surveyed in English Literary Renaissance [ELR] 30 (2000): 457-93. For studies on Renaissance masculinity, see Lorna Hutson, The Usurer's Daughter: Male Friendship and Fictions of Women in Sixteenth-Century England, 1994, and Lynn Enterline, The Tears of Narcissus: Melancholia and Masculinity in Early Modern Writing, 1995. On male homosexuality in the period, see Alan Bray, Homosexuality in Renaissance England, 1982; Bruce R. Smith, Homosexual Desire in Shakespeare's England: A Cultural Poetics, 1991; Jonathan Goldberg, Sodometries: Renaissance Texts, Modern Sexualities, 1992; and Same-Sex Desire in the English Renaissance: A Sourcebook of Texts, 1470-1650, ed. Kenneth Borris, 2003. Recent studies of Renaissance homoeroticism are surveyed in ELR 30 (2000): 284-329.

An invaluable tool for the study of early modern language and literature is the Oxford English Dictionary, 2nd ed., 1989, now also on CD-ROM, and online for subscribers. Also useful are Morris Tilley, A Dictionary of the Proverbs in England in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, 1950; Richard Jones, The Triumph of the English Language, 1953; Richard Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms, 1968; Lee Sonnino, A Handbook of Sixteenth-Century Rhetoric, 1968; James Hencke, Courtesans and Cuckolds: A Glossary of Renaissance Dramatic Bawdy (Exclusive of Shakespeare), 1979; Fausto Cercignani, Shakespeare's Works and Elizabethan Pronunciation, 1981; Eric Partridge, Shakespeare's Bawdy, 3rd ed., 1991; Paula Blank, Broken English: Dialects and the Politics of Language in Renaissance Writings, 1996; Charles Barber, Early Modern English, rev. ed., 1997; The Cambridge History of the English Language, vol. III: 1476-1776, 1999; and Jonathan Hope, Shakespeare's Grammar, 2003.

The journal English Literary Renaissance (ELR) regularly publishes surveys of recent studies of individual sixteenth- and seventeenth-century writers and of more general topics; the surveys are periodically updated. Each year, the winter issue of Studies in English Literature 1500-1900 publishes "Recent Studies in the English Renaissance," an evaluative overview of the preceding year's books in the field. These journals also publish important new articles on sixteenth-century topics, as do other Renaissance journals such as Early Modern Literary Studies, Journal of Medieval and Early Modern Studies, Renaissance Forum, Renaissance Quarterly, Renaissance Studies, and The Sixteenth Century Journal. There are also a number of journals devoted to particular sixteenth-century authors; and many journals whose scope is not limited to Renaissance studies—such as ELH (English Literary History) and Representations—often publish articles on sixteenth-century topics.

Roger Ascham

The Whole Works of Roger Ascham, 3 vols., ed. J. A. Giles, 1864-65, rpt. 1965, remains standard, although it omits some theological works and letters. The standard, annotated edition of The Scholemaster is by John E. B. Mayor, 1863, rpt. 1967. Lawrence V. Ryan edited The Schoolmaster in modern spelling, 1967; he also wrote a useful biographical and critical study, Roger Ascham, 1963. For Ascham's correspondence, see Letters of Roger Ascham, ed. Alvin Vos, 1989. Ascham studies are surveyed in ELR 10 (1980): 300-10, and in Jerome S. Dees, Sir Thomas Elyot and Roger Ascham: A Reference Guide, 1981.

Richard Barnfield

George Klawitter edited The Complete Poems, 1990; the edition includes a brief biography. Kenneth Borris and Klawitter have edited a collection of studies: The Affectionate Shepherd: Celebrating Richard Barnfield, 2001. Barnfield is also treated in Alan Bray, Homosexuality in Renaissance England, 1982; Gregory W. Bred-beck, Sodomy and Interpretation: Marlowe to Milton, 1991; and Bruce R. Smith, Homosexual Desire in Shakespeare's England: A Cultural Poetics, 1991. Recent work on Barnfield is briefly surveyed in ELR 30 (2000), 297.

Thomas Campion

The standard edition (including a biography) is Percival Vivian, Campion's Works, 1909, rpt. 1960. Campion's English works, with a selection from his Latin poetry, are edited by Walter R. Davis, 1967, who also published a biographical and critical study, Thomas Campion, 1987. Other studies include E. Lowbury et al., Thomas Campion, Poet, Composer, Physician, 1970; John Hollander, "The Case of Campion," in Vision and Resonance: Two Senses of Poetic Form, 1975, pp. 71-90; Muriel T. Eldridge, Thomas Campion: His Poetry and Music, 1977; Stephen Ratcliffe, Campion: On Song, 1981; David Lindley, Thomas Campion, 1986; and Christopher Wilson, Words and Notes Coupled Lovingly Together: Thomas Campion, A Critical Study, 1989. Campion studies are surveyed in ELR 4 (1974): 404-11 and 16 (1986): 253-56.

Samuel Daniel

The only complete edition is Complete Works in Verse and Prose, 5 vols., ed. A. B. Grosart, 1885—96, rpt. 1963; a new edition, by John Pitcher, is currently in preparation. A. C. Sprague edited Poems and A Defense of Rhyme, 1930, rpt. 1965. Geoffrey G. Hiller and Peter L. Groves edited Selected Poetry and "A Defense of Rhyme," 1998. Some useful studies are Joan Rees, Samuel Daniel, A Critical and Biographical Study, 1964; Cecil Seronsy, Samuel Daniel, 1967; Arthur F. Marotti, " 'Love is not Love': Elizabethan Sonnet Sequences and the Social Order," ELH 49 (1982): 396-128; and David Galbraith, Architectonics of Imitation in Spenser, Daniel, and Drayton, 2000. Studies of Daniel are surveyed in ELR 24 (1994): 489-502.

Michael Drayton

The standard edition is by J. W. Hebel, 5 vols., 1931—41, rpt. 1961; there is a useful selected edition by John Buxton, 1953. The standard biography is B. H. Newdigate, Michael Drayton and his Circle, 1941, rpt. 1961. Critical studies include J. A. Berthelot, Michael Drayton, 1967; R. F. Hardin, Michael Drayton and the Passing of Elizabethan England, 1973; and Jean R. Brink, Michael Drayton Revisited, 1990. There are valuable discussions of Drayton in Richard Helgerson, Forms of Nationhood, 1992; Claire McEachern, The Poetics of English Nationhood, 1590-1612, 1996; David Galbraith, Architectonics of Imitation in Spenser, Daniel, and Drayton, 2000; and Christopher Warley, " 'The English Straine': Absolutism, Class, and Drayton's Ideas," in Material Culture and Cultural Materialisms in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, ed. Curtis Perry, 2001.

Queen Elizabeth I

There is no complete edition, but Elizabeth I: Collected Works, ed. Leah S. Marcus, Janel Mueller, and Mary Beth Rose, 2000, includes a generous, well-edited, and fascinating selection of her letters, poems, prayers, and speeches. Some pieces not found in this volume are in the following: The Letters of Queen Elizabeth, ed. G. B. Harrison, 1935, rpt. 1968; The Public Speaking of Queen Elizabeth: Selections from her Official Addresses, ed. George P. Rice Jr., 1951, rpt. 1966; and The Poems of Queen Elizabeth I, ed. Leicester Bradner, 1964. Janel Mueller and Leah Marcus are also the editors of Elizabeth I: Autograph Compositions and Foreign Language Originals, 2003. Frances Teague surveys Elizabeth's life and writings, and prints a selection of her works, in Women Writers of the Renaissance and Reformation, ed. Katharina M. Wilson, 1987; Marc Shell edits and provides an extended commentary on one of her religious translations, in Elizabeth's Glass, 1993. Mary Thomas Crane has an entry on Elizabeth in Dictionary of Literary Biography, vol. 136, ed. David A. Richardson, 1994, pp. 85-93. The standard biography remains J. E. Neale, Queen Elizabeth I, 1934, rpt. 1967. More recent biographies include Susan Doran, Queen Elizabeth I, 2003, and David Loades, Elizabeth I, 2003. Maria Perry has a documentary biography, The Word of a Prince: The Life of Elizabeth I from Contemporary Documents, 1990. The queen's significance as political and cultural presence is treated by Frances Yates, Astraea: The Imperial Theme, 1975; Marie Axton, The Queen's Two Bodies: Drama and the Elizabethan Succession, 1977; Philippa Berry, Of Chastity and Power: Elizabethan Literature and the Unmarried Queen, 1989; Carole Levin, "The Heart and Stomach of a King": Elizabeth I and the Politics of Sex and Power, 1994; Mary Cole, The Portable Queen: Elizabeth I and the Politics of Ceremony, 1999; John Watkins, Representing Elizabeth in Stuart England: Literature, History, and Sovereignty, 2002; and The Myth of Elizabeth, ed. Susan Doran and Thomas Freeman, 2003. Susan Bassnett, Elizabeth I: A Feminist Perspective, 1988, approaches the queen's career through her writings; Susan Frye, Elizabeth I: The Competition for Representation, 1993, studies Elizabeth's construction of her power within a patriarchal society. ELR 23 (1993): 345-54, 24 (1994): 234-36, and 30 (2000): 470—73, survey recent studies of Elizabeth.

Faith in Conflict

Debora Shuger's The Renaissance Bible: Scholarship, Sacrifice, and Subjectivity, 1994, analyzes the place of Scripture in a wide range of early modern discourses. Shuger is also the author of Political Theologies in Shakespeare's England: The Sacred and the State in "Measure for Measure," 2001. Other important studies include Tessa Watt, Cheap Print and Popular Piety, 1550-1640, 1991; Religion and Culture in Renaissance England, ed. Claire McEachern and Debora Shuger, 1997; Alison Shell, Catholicism, Controversy, and the English Literary Imagination, 1558-1660, 1999; Ramie Targoff, Common Prayer: The Language of Public Devotion in Early Modern England, 2001; and Brian Cummings, The Literary Culture of the Reformation: Grammar and Grace, 2002. Studies of the English Bible include John Coolidge, The Pauline Renaissance in England: Puritanism and the Bible, 1970; David Daiches, The King James Version of the English Bible, 1968; F. F. Bruce, History of the Bible in English, 1978; A. C. Partridge, English Biblical Translation, 1973; David Daniell, The Bible in English: Its History and Influence, 2003; and Adam Nicolson, God's Secretaries: The Making of the King James Bible, 2003. Tyndale's doctrinal treatises were edited by Henry Walter in 1848; there is a modern biography of him by David Daniell, 1994, and an account of his psychological and literary power in Stephen Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning, 1980. Tyndale is also treated in John D. Long, The Bible in English: John Wycliffe and William Tyndale, 1998. William Bouwsma, John Calvin: A Sixteenth-Century Portrait, 1988, is a fine introduction to the life and thought of the reformer. Other recent studies include Bernard Cottret, Calvin: A Biography, trans. M. Wallace McDonald, 2000, and Richard Muller, The Unaccommodated Calvin: Studies in the Foundation of a Theological Tradition, 2000. There are selections from Anne Askew's examinations in The Paradise of Women, ed. Betty Travitsky, 1981, and an analysis of her challenge to authority in Elaine Beilin, Redeeming Eve, 1987. Beilin has also edited The Examinations of Anne Askew, 1996. John Booty edited the 1559 version of the Book of Common Prayer in 1976; Booty also edited The Godly Kingdom of Tudor England, 1981, a useful collection of essays on the prayer book, the Book of Homilies, and other Reformation texts. Ronald Bond edited "Certain Sermons or Homilies" (1547) and "A Homily against Disobedience and Wilful Rebellion" (1570), 1987. There is a major biography of Thomas Cranmer by Diarmaid MacCulloch, 1996. See also entries under Foxe, Hooker, More, and Southwell.

John Foxe

There is no standard edition of Foxe's collected works. The most useful modern edition of The Acts and Monuments is that by Stephen R. Cattley, 8 vols., 1837-41, revised by Josiah Pratt, 1877, and rpt. 1965. The best account of Foxe's life is J. F. Mozley's John Foxe and His Book, 1940, rpt. 1970. A more recent study of the life and works is Warren Wooden, John Foxe, 1983. On Foxe's significance, see William Haller, The Elect Nation: The Meaning and Relevance of Foxe's Book of Martyrs, 1963; V. Olson, John Foxe and the Elizabethan Church, 1973; discussions in John King, English Reformation Literature, 1982; John Knott, Discourses of Martyrdom in English Literature, 1653-1694, 1994; Huston Diehl, Staging Reform, Reforming the Stage: Protestantism and Popidar Theater in Early Modern England, 1997; John Foxe and His World, ed. Christopher Highley and John King, 2002; Cynthia Marshall, The Shattering of the Self: Violence, Subjectivity, and Early Modern Texts, 2002; Marsha Robinson, Writing the Reformation: "Actes and Monuments" and the Jacobean History Play, 2002; and James Knapp, Illustrating the Past in Early Modern England: The Representation of History in Printed Books, 2003. For a discussion of Foxe's role in the shaping of English nationalism, see Richard Helgerson, Forms of Nationhood, 1992. A survey of Foxe studies is in ELR 11 (1981): 224-32. See also entries under Faith in Conflict.

Arthur Golding

Ovid's Metamorphoses: The Arthur Golding Translation was edited by John F. Nims, 1965; it is analyzed in Gordon Braden, The Classics and English Renaissance Poetry: Three Case Studies, 1978, and in Raphael Lyne, Ovid's Changing Worlds: English Metamorphoses, 1567-1632, 2001. The only general study is L. T. Golding's biographical/critical account, Aw Elizabethan Puritan, 1937.

Lady Jane Grey

Most of Lady Jane Grey's surviving writings, and the account of her death, were printed in John Foxe's Acts and Monuments (see above). These pages of Foxe are reproduced in facsimile in The Early Modern Englishwoman, Series I, pt. 2, vol. 2, Brief Confessional Writings, ed. Mary Ellen Lamb, 2001; but the texts are more conveniently read in the 1837-41 edition of Acts and Monuments (rpt. 1965), 6.415-25. Jane's writings as found in Thomas Bentley's Monument of Matrons (1582), with contextual materials by John N. King, are available (to subscribers) in Renaissance Women Online, a subset of the Brown University Women Writers Project: wwp.brown.edu/texts/rwoentry.html. A letter from Jane to Mary I, begging pardon for her part (an unwilling one) in the plot to put her on the throne, is printed in J. M. Stone, The History of Mary I, Queen of England, 1901, pp. 496-99. The anonymous Chronicle of Queen Jane, and of Two Years of Queen Mary. . . . Written by a Resident in the Tower of London, ed. John Gough Nichols, 1850, includes a record of a dinner-table conversation with Jane (pp. 25-26) and the texts of two brief letters inscribed in her prayer book shortly before her execution (p. 57n). The best biography is Hester W. Chapman, Lady Jane Grey, 1962. An overview of her life and writings is included in Roland H. Bain-ton, Women of the Reformation in France and England, 1973; and there is a survey-assessment of her writings in Elaine V. Beilin, Redeeming Eve: Women Writers of the English Renaissance, 1987, pp. 75-81.

Fulke Greville

Most of Greville's literary works are in The Poems and Dramas of Fildke Greville, First Lord Brooke, 2 vols., ed. Geoffrey Bullough, 1939, rpt. 1945; G. A. Wilkes edited the other philosophical poems, The Remains, Being Poems of Monarchy and Religion, 1965; Greville's Prose Works, including his Life of Sir Philip Sidney, were edited by John Gouws, 1986. There are editions of Selected Poems by Thorn Gunn, 1968, and Neil Powell, 1990, and of Selected Writings by Joan Rees, 1973. The major biography is by Ronald A. Rebholz, 1971; there is also a critical biography by Joan Rees, 1971. Important critical studies are Richard Waswo, The Fatal Mirror: Themes and Techniques in the Poetry of Fulke Greville, 1972, and C. H. Howard, Fildke Greville, 1980. Scholarship is surveyed in P. J. Klemp, Fulke Greville and Sir John Davies: A Reference Guide, 1985, and the Sidney Journal 19 (1-2): 1-182 is a special double issue devoted to Greville.

Thomas Hariot

Hariot's Report on Virginia is handsomely edited, with illustrations first published in the 1590 edition, by Paul Hulton, 1972. The Report was included in Richard Hakluyt's collection The Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffics, and Discoveries of the English Nation, 1598-1600, ed. in 12 vols., Glasgow, 1903-05, 8: 348-86. See George B. Parks, Richard Hakluyt and the English Voyages, 1928. Useful biographical studies are Muriel Rukeyser, The Traces of Thomas Hariot, 1971, and James W. Shirley, Thomas Hariot, a Biography, 1983. Stephen Greenblatt analyzes the cultural response to Hariot's report in "Invisible Bullets: Renaissance Authority and Its Subversion," Glyph 8 (1981): 40-61; the work is also examined by Shannon Miller in Invested with Meaning: The Raleigh Circle in the New World, 1998. For studies on Hariot and mathematics, see Amir R. Alexander, Geometrical Landscapes: The Voyages of Discovery and the Transformation of Mathematical Practice, 2002, and Jacqueline A. Stedall, The Create Invention of Algebra: Thomas Hariot's Treatise on Equations, 2003. See also entries under The Wider World.

Mary (Sidney) Herbert, Countess of Pembroke Margaret P. Hannay et al. edited the Collected Works, 2 vols., 1998; there is an important edition of The Psalms of Sir Philip Sidney and the Countess of Pembroke, ed. J. C. A. Rathmell, 1963. Margaret P. Hannay has written the only literary biography, Philip's Phoenix, 1990. Mary Herbert is also one of the three writers treated in Kim Walker, Women Writers of the English Renaissance, 1996, and she is discussed in Elizabeth Mazzola, Favorite Sons: The Politics and Poetics of the Sidney Family, 2003. Other important studies are Gary Waller, Maiy Sidney, Countess of Pembroke: A Critical Study of Her Writings and Literary Milieu, 1979, and Mary Ellen Lamb, Gender and Authorship in the Sidney Circle, 1990. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 14 (1984): 426-37 and 24 (1994): 237-38, and recent studies of metrical psalms are surveyed in ELR 33 (2003): 252-75.

Sir Thomas Hoby

Hoby's Book of the Courtier was edited by Walter Raleigh, 1900, rpt. 1967. Hoby's diary, The Booke of the Travaile and Lief of Me, was edited by E. Powell, 1902. Castiglione's Il Cortegiano received a fine modern translation by C. S. Singleton in 1959, rpt. 2002, ed. Daniel Javitch. The significance of the work is discussed in Wayne A. Rebhorn, Courty Performances, 1978; Castiglione: The Ideal and the Real in Renaissance Culture, ed. Robert W. Hanning and David Rosand, 1983; Frank Whigham, Ambition and Privilege, 1984; Peter Burke, The Fortunes of the "Courtier": The European Reception of Castiglione's "Cortegiano", 1995; and David Glimp, Increase and Multiply: Governing Cultural Reproduction in Early Modern England, 2003.

Richard Hooker

Hooker's Works are edited by G. Edelen et al., 5 vols., 1977-98; the first four volumes include the Laws. Arthur Stephen McGrade published a handy, useful edition of the Preface and Books 1 and 8 in 1989. Isaac Walton wrote a Life of Hooker in 1665; it is reprinted in The Lives of John Donne, Sir Henry Wotton, Richard Hooker, George Herbert, and Robert Sanderson, ed. George Saintsbury, 1927, rpt. 1956. There is a brief modern treatment of Hooker's life and works by Arthur Pollard, 1966. Some important studies are C. J. Sisson, The Judicious Marriage of Mr. Hooker and the Birth of "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity", 1940; E. T. Davies, The Political Ideas of Richard Hooker, 1946; Studies in Richard Hooker, ed. W. Speed Hill, 1972; R. K. Faulkner, Richard Hooker and the Politics of a Christian England, 1981; Richard Hooker and the Construction of Christian Community, ed. Arthur S. McGrade, 1997, which includes a selected bibliography; Philip B. Secor, Richard Hooker, Prophet of Anglicanism, 1999; and Nigel Voak, Richard Hooker and Reformed Theology: A Study of Reason, Will, and Grace, 2003. See also entries under Faith in Conflict.

John Lyly

The Complete Works are edited by R. Warwick Bond, 3 vols., 1902; an important edition and analysis of Euphues is by M. W. Croll and H. demons, 1916; there is also a more recent edition, by Leah Scragg, 2003. Significant studies include Jonas Barish, "The prose-style of Lyly," ELH 23 (1956): 14-35; G. It. Hunter, The Humanist as Courtier, 1962; Joseph W. Houpert, John Lyly, 1975; Richard Helgerson in The Elizabethan Prodigals, 1976; Devon L. Hodges in Renaissance Fictions of Anatomy, 1985; Paul Salzman, English Prose Fiction, 1558—1700: A Critical History, 1985; R. W. Maslen, Elizabethan Fictions, 1997; and Leah Guenther, "To Parley Euphuism': Fashioning English as a Linguistic Fad," Renaissance Studies 16 (2002): 24—35. Lyly studies are surveyed in ELR 22 (1992): 435-50, and 25 (1995): 258-59.

Christopher Marlowe

The current standard edition is The Complete Works of Christopher Marlowe, Oxford English Texts, 5 vols. 1987-98. W. W. Greg edited parallel texts of the two versions of Dr. Faustus in 1950; the two versions have also been edited by David Bevington and Eric Rasmussen, 1993. Stephen Orgel edited The Complete Poems and Translations of Christopher Marlowe, 1971. See also the Norton Critical Edition of Dr. Faustus. For Marlowe's biography see John Bakeless, The Tragical History of Christopher Marlowe, 2 vols., 1942; Charles Nicholl, The Reckoning: The Murder of Christopher Marlowe, 1992; Constance Brown Kuriyama, Christopher Marlowe: A Renaissance Life, 2002; and David Riggs, The World of Christopher Marlowe, 2004. Valuable critical studies include Harry Levin, The Overreacher, 1952; Two Renaissance Mythmakers: Christopher Marlowe and Ben Jonson, ed. Alvin B. Kernan, 1977; Marlowe: The Critical Heritage, ed. Millar McLure, 1979; Christopher Marlowe, in the series "Modern Critical Views," ed. Harold Bloom, 1986; C. L. Barber, Creating Elizabethan Tragedy: the Theater of Marlowe and Kyd, 1988. Christopher Marlowe's "Doctor Faustus," in "Modern Critical Interpretations," ed. Harold Bloom, 1988; Christopher Marlowe and English Renaissance Culture, ed. Darryll Granley and Peter Roberts, 1996; Patrick Cheney, Marlowe's Counterfeit Profession: Ovid, Spenser, Counter-Nationhood, 1997; Marlowe, History, and Sexuality: New Critical Essays on Christopher Marlowe, ed. Paul White, 1998; Christopher Marlowe, ed. Richard Wilson, 1999; Constructing Christopher Marlowe, ed. J. A. Downie and J. T. Parnell, 2000; Marlowe's Empery: Expanding his Critical Contexts, ed. Sara Deats and Robert Logan, 2002; Ruth Lunney, Marlowe and the Popular Tradition: Innovation in the English Drama before 1595, 2002; and The Cambridge Companion to Christopher Marlowe, ed. Patrick Cheney, 2004. For Hero and Leander, Louis L. Martz's facsimile of the first edition, 1972, has an important introduction. On the genre, see William Keach, Elizabethan Erotic Narratives, 1977, and Clark Hulse, Metamorphic Verse: The Elizabethan Minor Epic, 1981. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 7 (1977): 382-99; 18 (1988): 329-42; and 31 (2001): 288-328.

Queen Mary I

There is no edition of the writings of Mary I. A number of her letters, as well as various reports of her words and actions, are scattered in several volumes of two series of state papers published by the Public Record Office, London: Letters and Papers Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII (LP); Calendar of Letters, Despatches, and State Papers [Spanish]. The best biographies are H. F. M. Prescott, Mary Tudor, rev. 1952, and David Loades, Mary Tudor: A Life, 1989. There is a compact account of Mary's life and writings in Roland H. Bainton, Women of the Reformation in France and England, 1973.

Mary, Queen of Scots

The French originals of Mary's letters were edited by A. Labanoff, Lettres, instructions et Memoires de Marie Stuart, Reine d'Ecosse, 7 vols., 1844. A generous selection of the letters in English translation, together with various other documents relating to Mary, was published by Agnes Strickland, in Letters of Mary, Queen of Scots, 2 vols., 1843. Neither Labanoff nor Strickland printed the Casket Letters, regarding them, as do all of Mary's partisans, as forgeries. The surviving sixteenth-century versions of the letters—French and Scots versions for all of them, English and Latin for some—are handily collected in an appendix to T. F. Henderson, The Casket Letters and Mary Queen of Scots, 2nd ed., 1890. The letters are also printed, and extensively analyzed, in M. H. Armstrong Davison, The Casket Letters, 1965. Mary's poems are translated and edited by Robin Bell, in Bittersweet Within My Heart: The Collected Poems of Mary, Queen of Scots, 1992. The best biographies are Antonia Fraser, Mary Queen of Scots, 1969, and John Guy, "My Heart is My Own": The Life of Mary Queen of Scots, 2004. There are also three valuable studies by Gordon Donaldson: The First Trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, 1969; Mary Queen of Scots, 1974; All the Queen's Men: Power and Politics in Mary Stewart's Scotland, 1983; another important study is Jayne Elizabeth Lewis, Mary Queen of Scots: Romance and Nation, 1998. There is a brief summary of recent scholarship on Mary in ELR 30 (2000): 476-77.

Sir Thomas More

The Yale Edition of the Complete Works of St. Thomas More, 15 vols., 1963—97, is standard. Vol. 4 of this edition is Utopia, ed. Edward L. Surtz, S.J., and J. H. Hexter, 1965; it includes a wealth of information and commentary. The other standard edition of Utopia is Utopia: Latin Text and English Translation, ed. George M. Logan, Robert M. Adams, and Clarence H. Miller, 1995. Adams's Norton Critical Edition, rev. 1992, which provides the basis for our text, includes background readings and a selection of the best criticism on Utopia. Logan and Adams collaborated on another student edition of Utopia, for the Cambridge Texts in the History of Political Thought, 1989, rev. 2002; it includes an evaluative guide to Utopian scholarship. More's History of King Richard III is vol. 3 of the Yale edition, ed. Richard S. Sylvester, 1963, but is most conveniently read in Logan's edition, 2005. The biography by More's son-in-law William Roper is published in Txvo Early Tudor Lives, ed. Sylvester and Davis P. Harding, 1962, and in More, Selected Writings, ed. John Thornton and Susan Varenne, 2003. The Last Letters of Thomas More, ed. Alvaro de Silva, 2000, provides a glimpse into More's final days. R. W. Chambers's eminently readable Thomas More, 1935, long the standard modern biography, is now superseded by more recent ones, Richard Marius, Thomas More, 1984; Peter Ackroyd, The Life of Thomas More, 1998; and John Guy, Thomas More, 2000. The psychobiographical essay in Stephen Greenblatt's Renaissance Self-Fashioning from More to Shakespeare, 1980, has been influential, as has Alistair Fox's overview of the life and works, Thomas More: History and Providence, 1983. Influential books on Utopia include Hexter's brilliant More's "Utopia": The Biography of an Idea, 1952, rpt. with an epilogue 1965, and rewritten in his section of the introduction to the Yale Utopia; Surtz, The Praise of Pleasure: Philosophy, Education, and Communism in More's Utopia, 1957; Logan, The Meaning of More's "Utopia," 1983; and Dominic Baker's synthesis, More's "Utopia," 1991. Essential Articles for the Study of Thomas More, ed. Sylvester and G. P. Marc'hadour, 1977, reprints many valuable articles. Recent studies are surveyed by Michael D. Wentworth, The Essential Sir Thomas More: An Annotated Bibliography of Major Modern Studies, 1995, and by Albert J. Geritz, Thomas More: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticism, 1935-1997, 1998. There is also an online bibliography, devoted to Utopia alone and covering the period ca. 1890-1995, by Romauld Lakowski: www.shu.ac.uk/emls/01-2/lakomore.html. The journal Moreana publishes articles on More and reviews scholarship on him.

Thomas Nashe

The standard edition, 5 vols., is by R. W. McKerrow, rev. F. P. Wilson, 1958; there are selected editions by Stanley Wells, 1965, and J. B. Steane, 1972. Charles Nicholl has written A Cup of News: The Life of Thomas Nashe, 1984. Useful critical studies include G. R. Hibbard, Thomas Nashe: A Critical Introduction, 1962; Jonathan V. Crewe, Unredeemed Rhetoric: Thomas Nashe and the Scandal of Authorship, 1982; Stephen S. Hilliard, The Singularity of Thomas

Nashe, 1986; Lorna Hutson, Thomas Nashe in Context, 1989; James Nielson, Unread Herrings: Thomas Nashe and the Prosaics of the Real, 1993; and Peter Holbrook, Literature and Degree in Renaissance England: Nashe, Bourgeois Tragedy, Shakespeare, 1994. ELR 25 (1995): 261-64 reviews studies of Nashe.

Sir Walter Raleigh

The collected edition is by William Oldys and Thomas Birch, 8 vols., 1829, rpt. 1965; the standard edition of the poems is by A. M. C. Latham, rev. 1950; more recent is The Poems of Sir Walter Raleigh: A Historical Edition, ed. Michael Rudick, 1999. The History of the World is edited by C. A. Patrides, 1971. Another useful edition is Selected Writings, ed. Gerard Hammond, 1984. The Discoverie of the Large, Rich and Bewtifid Em-pyre of Guiana has been newly edited, with much contextual and interpretive material, by Neil L. Whitehead, 1997. For Raleigh's correspondence, see The Letters of Sir Walter Raleigh, ed. Agnes Latham and Joyce Youings, 1999. Biographies include Willard M. Wallace, Sir Walter Raleigh, 1959, and Stephen Coote, A Play of Passion, 1993. Noteworthy studies include David B. Quinn, Raleigh and the British Empire, 1947, rpt. 1962; E. A. Strathmann, Sir Walter Raleigh, A Study in Elizabethan Skepticism, 1951; Philip Edwards, Sir Walter Raleigh, 1953, rpt. 1976; Stephen Greenblatt, Sir Walter Raleigh, 1973; and Shannon Miller, Invested with Meaning: The Raleigh Circle in the New World, 1998. For guides to scholarship, see Jerry L. Mills, Sir Walter Raleigh: A Reference Guide, 1986, and Christopher Armitage, Sir Walter Raleigh, An Annotated Bibliography, 1987. See also entries under The Wider World.

William Shakespeare

Important editions of Twelfth Night include the Variorum (ed. H. H. Furness, 1901); the Arden (eds. J. M. Lothian and T. W. Craik, 1975); and the Oxford (eds. Roger Warren and Stanley Wells, 1994). Important editions of King Lear include the Variorum (ed. H. H. Furness, 1880); the Arden (ed. Reginald Foakes, 1997); and the New Cambridge (ed. Jay Halio, 1992). The Complete King Lear, 1608-1623, ed. Michael Warren, 1989, is a valuable resource for textual study. The Norton Shakespeare, ed. Stephen Greenblatt et al., 1997, presents the quarto and Folio texts of King Lear on facing pages, as does the Pelican King Lear: The 1608 Quarto and 1623 Folio Texts, ed. Stephen Orgel, 2000. The two versions are discussed in The Division of the Kingdoms, ed. Gary Taylor and Michael Warren, 1983. For the quarto version on its own, see The History of King Lear, ed. Stanley Wells on the basis of a text prepared by Gary Taylor, 2000. Significant studies of Twelfth Night are assembled by Walter King ("Twentieth Century Interpretations"), 1968; Stanley Wells ("Critical Essays"), 1986; Harold Bloom ("Modern Critical Interpretations"), 1987; and Barbara Everett ("New Casebooks"), 1996. The play is treated in the context of Shakespearean comedy by C. L. Barber, Shakespeare's Festive Comedy, 1959; Northrop Frye, A Natural Perspective, 1965; Linda Bamber, Comic Women, Tragic Men, 1982; Edward Berry, Shakespeare's Comic Rites, 1984; and William Carroll, The Metamorphoses of Shakespearean Comedy, 1985. Other important studies include Stephen Greenblatt, "Fiction and Friction," in Shakespearean Negotiations, 1988; Laura Levine, Men in Women's Clothing: Anti-Theatricality and Effeminization, 1579 to 1642, 1994; and Stephen Booth, Precious Nonsense: The Gettysburg Address, Ben Jonson's Epitaphs on His Children, and "Twelfth Night," 1998. For the music in Twelfth Night (and other Shakespeare plays), see Ross Durfin, Shakespeare's Songhook, 2004, with CD. Among the many great essays on King Lear are those in A. C. Bradley, Shakespearean Tragedy, 1904; J. V. Cunningham, Woe or Wonder, 1951; Jan Kott, Shakespeare Our Contemporary, 1967; Stephen Booth, "King Lear," "Macbeth," Indefinition, and Tragedy, 1983; and Stanley Cavell, Disowning Knowledge, 1987, updated 2003. Significant essays on the play are assembled by Janet Adelman ("Twentieth Century Interpretations"), 1978; Harold Bloom ("Modern Critical Interpretations"), 1987; Kieran Ryan ("New Casebooks"), 1993; and Jay Halio ("Critical Essays"), 1996. See also Halio, "King Lear": A Guide to the Play, 2001; "King Lear" and its Afterlife, a themed issue of Shakespeare Survey 55 (2002), ed. Peter Holland; and Grace Ioppolo, A Routledge Literary Sourcebook on William Shakespeare's "King Lear," 2003.

The objects of obsessive critical attention for centuries, Shakespeare's plays have recently been studied from new-historicist, feminist, psychoanalytic, and deconstructive perspectives, among others. The range may be sampled in such collections as Representing Shakespeare: New Psychoanalytic Essays, ed. Murray Schwartz and Coppelia Kahn, 1980; Alternative Shakespeares, ed. John Drakakis, 1985, 2nd ed. 2002; Shakespeare and the Question of Theory, ed. Patricia Parker and Geoffrey Hartman, 1985; Shakespeare Reproduced, ed. Jean Howard and M. O'Connor, 1987; Political Shakespeare, ed. Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfield, 1994; and in such books as Lisa Jardine, Still Harping on Daughters, 1983; Maijorie Garber, Shakespeare's Ghost Writers, 1987; Stephen Greenblatt, Shakespearean Negotiations, 1988; Margreta de Grazia, Shakespeare Verbatim, 1991; Janet Adelman, Suffocating Mothers, 1992; Valerie Traub, Desire and Anxiety, 1992; Harry Berger Jr., Making Trifles of Terrors, 1997; David Kastan, Shakespeare After Theory, 1999; Shakespeare, the Critical Complex, 10 vols., ed. Stephen Orgel and Sean Keilin, 1999; Lynn Esche, and Nigel Wheale, 2003; and Shakespeare in Performance: A Collection of Essays, ed. Frank Occhiogrosso, 2003.

Hyder Rollins's Variorum edition of the sonnets, 2 vols., 1944, summarizes many commentaries and problems; Stephen Booth's edition, 1977, presents a facsimile of the first edition and a modernized text on facing pages, with elaborate commentary; see, likewise, the Arden Edition (ed. K. Duncan-Jones, 1997) and Helen Vendler, The Art of Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1997. Other recent editions include The Sonnets and A Lover's Complaint, ed. John Kerrigan, 1986; Shakespeare's Sonnets and Poems, ed. Harold Bloom, 1999; and Shakespeare: The Complete Sonnets and Poems, ed. Colin Burrow, 2002. Noteworthy criticism of the sonnets and poems includes Stephen Booth, An Essay on Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1969; Joseph Pequigney, Such Is My Love: A Study of Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1985; Joel Fineman, Shakespeare's Perjured Eye: The Invention of Poetic Subjectivity in the Sonnets, 1986; Heather Dubrow, Captive Victors: Shakespeare's Narrative Poems and Sonnets, 1987; Bruce Smith, Homosexual Desire in Shakespeare's England, 1991; Margreta de Grazia, "The Scandal of Shakespeare's Sonnets," in Shakespeare Survey 46 (1994): 35-49; Shakespeare's Sonnets: Critical Essays, ed. James Schiffer, 1999; Richard Halpern, Shakespeare's Perfume: Sodomy and Sublimity in the Sonnets, Wilde, Freud, and Lacan, 2002; and Sasha Roberts, Reading Shakespeare's Poems in Early Modern England, 2003.

The life and works are treated by E. K. Chambers, William Shakespeare: A Study of Facts and Problems, 2 vols., 1930. S. Schoenbaum's important biographical research is recorded in William Shakespeare: A Documentary Life, 1975, and A Compact Documentary Life, 1977. Recent biographical studies include Stanley Wells, Shakespeare: A Dramatic Life, 1994; Jonathan Bate, The Genius of Shakespeare, 1997; Park Honan, Shakespeare: A Life, 1998; Katherine Duncan-Jones, Ungentle Shakespeare: Scenes from his Life, 2001; and Stephen Greenblatt, Will in the World: How Shakespeare Became Shakespeare, 2004; and James Shapiro, A Year in the Life of William Shakespeare, 2005. Some useful aids to scholarship are Geoffrey Bullough, Narrative and Dramatic Sources of Shakespeare, 8 vols., 1957–75, and A New Companion to Shakespeare Studies, ed. Kenneth Muir and S. Schoenbaum, 1971, rpt. 1976.

Sir Philip Sidney

Oxford editions are standard for everything except the correspondence: the poetry is edited by William A. Ringler jr., 1962; the Old Arcadia by Jean Robertson, 1973; the New Arcadia by Victor Skretkovicz, 1987; and the Miscellaneous Prose (including the Defense) by Katherine Duncan-Jones and Jan Van Dorsten, 1973. Sidney's letters are found in The Prose Works of Sir Philip Sidney, 4 vols., ed. Albert Feuillerat, 1912, rpt. 1962, 3:75–184. There are valuable editions of the Defense by Geoffrey Shepherd, 1965, 3rd ed., 2002, and Jan Van Dorsten, 1966. Maurice Evans edited The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia (the 1593 composite version) in 1977. Useful volumes of selected works are those by David Kalstone, 1970; Duncan-Jones for the Oxford English Authors series, 1989; Catherine Bates (poetry), 1994; and Elizabeth P. Watson, 1997. The earliest biography was by Sidney's friend Fulke Greville, 1652; it is included in Greville's Prose Works, ed. John Gouws, 1986. The standard modern biography is Duncan-Jones, Sir Philip Sidney: Courtier Poet, 1991. Modern studies of the life and works are John Buxton, Sir Philip Sidney and the English Renaissance, 1954, rpt. 1964; James M. Osborn, Young Philip Sidney, 1972; A. C. Hamilton, Sir Philip Sidney: A Study of His Life and Works, 1977; and Alan Stewart, Philip Sidney: A Double Life, 2000. Some important critical studies are Walter R. Davis and Richard Lanham, Sidney's Arcadia, 1965; David Kalstone, Sidney's Poetry: Contexts and Interpretations, 1965; Neil L. Rudenstine, Sidney's Poetic Development, 1967; Andrew Weiner, Sir Philip Sidney and the Poetics of Protestantism, 1978; Richard C. McCoy, Sir Philip Sidney: Rebellion in Arcadia, 1979; Stephen Greenblatt, "Murdering Peasants: Status, Genre, and the Representation of Rebellion," in Representations 1 (1983): 1–29; Joan Rees, Sir Philip Sidney and "Arcadia," 1991; Roland Greene in Post-Petrarchism, 1991; Blair Worden, The Sound of Virtue: Philip Sidney's "Arcadia" and Elizabethan Politics, 1996; Henry Woudhuysen, Sir Philip Sidney and the Circulation of Manuscripts, 1558–1640, 1996; Edward Berry, The Making of Sir Philip Sidney, 1998; Lisa Klein, The Exemplary Sidney and the Elizabethan Sonneteer, 1998; Tom Parker, Proportional Form in the Sonnets of the Sidney Circle: Loving in Truth, 1998; and Elizabeth Mazzola, Favorite Sons: The Politics and Poetics of the Sidney Family, 2003. Dennis Kay edited Sir Philip Sidney: An Anthology of Modern Criticism, 1987. Sidney in Retrospect: Selections from "English Literary Renaissance," ed. Arthur F. Kinney, 1988, reprints articles and reviews of scholarship from a leading Renaissance journal. Studies of Arcadia are surveyed in ELR 26 (1996): 173–81.

John Skelton

The comprehensive edition is Alexander Dyce, Poetical Works, 2 vols., 1843, rpt. 1965; the standard edition for the English poems is by John Scattergood, 1983. There are also useful editions by Philip Henderson, rev. 1964, and Robert Kinsman, 1969. Biographical studies include H. L. R. Edwards, Skelton: The Life and Times of an Early Tudor Poet, 1949; Maurice Pollet, John Skelton: Poet of Tudor England, 1971; and Greg Walter, John Skelton and the Politics of the 1520s, 1988. Noteworthy critical studies include Arthur R. Heiserman, Skelton and Satire, 1961; Stanley Fish, John Skelton's Poetry, 1965; Arthur F. Kinney, John Skelton, Priest as Poet: Seasons of Discovery, 1987; and Richard Halpern, The Poetics of Primitive Accumulation, 1991. Anthony S. G. Edwards edited Skelton: The Critical Heritage, 1981. ELR 20 (1990): 505–16 surveys scholarship.

Robert Southwell

The standard edition of Southwell's poetry, by James H. McDonald and Nancy Pollard Brown, 1967, includes a biographical account. There is also a biography by Christopher Devlin, Life of Robert Southwell, Poet and Martyr, 1956, and an overview of the life and works by F. W. Brownlow, 1996. Important studies include P. Janelle, Robert Southwell the Writer, 1935; Louis L. Martz, in The Poetry of Meditation, rev. 1962; Helen C. White in Tudor Books of Saints and Martyrs, 1963; A. D. Cousins, The Catholic Religious Poets from Southwell to Crashaw, 1991; and Scott R. Pilarz, S.J., Robert Southwell and the Mission of Literature, 1561–1595, 2004. John Bossy, The English Catholic Community, 1570–1850, 1976, provides a good introduction to the dangerous world of the Catholic recusants and their missionary priests. ELR 13 (1983): 221–27 contains a review of critical studies. See also entries under Faith in Conflict.

Edmund Spenser

Edwin A. Greenlaw et al. edited a ten-volume Variorum edition, The Works of Edmund Spenser 1932–49. Important editions of The Faerie Queene are by A. C. Hamilton, 1977, 2nd ed., 2001, and Thomas P. Roche Jr., 1978; William A. Oram et al. edited The Yale Edition of the Shorter Poems of Edmund Spenser, 1989. The chief biography is The Life of Edmund Spenser by Alexander Judson, 1945. Two recent overviews of the life and works are Gary Waller, Edmund Spenser, A Literary Life, 1994, and Oram, Edmund Spenser, 1997. Important critical studies include C. S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love, 1936; Paul J. Alpers, The Poetry of "The Faerie Queene," 1967; Isabel MacCaffrey, Spenser's Allegory: The Anatomy of Imagination, 1975; James Nohrnberg, The Analogy of "The Faerie Queene," 1976; Michael O'Connell, Mirror and Veil: The Historical Dimension of Spenser's "Faerie Queene," 1977; Jonathan Goldberg, Endless Works: Spenser and the Structure of Discourse, 1981; John Guillory, Poetic Authority: Spenser, Milton, and Literary History, 1983; Kenneth Gross, Spenserian Poetics: Idolatry, Iconoclasm, and Magic, 1985; Harry Berger Jr., Revisionary Play: Studies in the Spenserian Dynamics, 1988; David L. Miller, The Poem's Two Bodies: The Poetics of the 1590 "Faerie Queene," 1988; John N. King, Spenser's Poetry and the Reformation Tradition, 1990; Theresa M. Krier, Gazing on Secret Sights: Spenser, Classical Imitation, and the Decorums of Vision, 1990; Jeffrey Knapp, An Empire Nowhere: England, America, and Literature from "Utopia" to "The Tempest," 1992; Richard Rambuss, Spenser's Secret Career, 1993; Gordon Teskey, Allegory and Violence, 1994; James W. Broadus, Spenser's Allegory of Love: Social Vision in Books III, IV, and V of "The Faerie Queene," 1995; Linda Gregerson, The Reformation of the Subject: Spenser, Milton, and the English Protestant Epic, 1995; Lauren Silberman, Transforming Desire: Erotic Knowledge in Books III and IV of "The Faerie Queene," 1995; Colin Burrow, Edmund Spenser, 1996; Willy Maley, Salvaging Spenser: Colonialism, Culture, and Identity, 1997; Carol V. Kaske, Spenser and Biblical Poetics, 1999; Kenneth Borris, Allegory and Epic in English Renaissance Literature: Heroic Form in Sidney, Spenser, and Milton, 2000; Richard A. McCabe, Spenser's Monstrous Regiment: Elizabethan Ireland and the Poetics of Difference, 2002; and Andrew Hadfield, Shakespeare, Spenser, and the Matter of Britain, 2004. A. C. Hamilton edited Essential Articles for the Study of Edmund Spenser, 1972. A wide range of criticism is reprinted in Hugh Maclean and Anne Lake Prescott's Norton Critical Edition, Edmund Spenser's Poetry, rev. 1993. Mihoko Suzuki edited a collection of recent Critical Essays on Edmund Spenser, 1996; a parallel collection, issued the same year, is Edmund Spen- ser, ed. Andrew Hadfield. Hadfield is also the editor of The Cambridge Companion to Spenser, 2001. A collection that students may find intriguing is Approaches to Teaching Spenser's "Faerie Queene," ed. David L. Miller and Alexander Dunlop, 1994. The Spenser Encyclopedia, ed. Hamilton et al., 1990, is an invaluable aid. The best guides to recent work are the bibliographies in the encyclopedia and the selected bibliography, with annotations, in Oram's Edmund Spenser.

Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey

The complete edition is by F. M. Padelford, 1928, rpt. 1966; Emrys Jones's excellent selected edition, 1964, is widely used. Tottel's Miscellany is edited by Hyder E. Rollins, 2 vols., rev. 1965. Biographies include E. R. Casady, Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, 1938, rpt. 1966, and W. R. Sessions, Henry Howard, The Poet Earl of Surrey: A Life, 1999. Noteworthy critical studies are Walter R. Davis, "Contexts in Surrey's Poetry," ELR 4 (1974): 40-55; the chapters on Surrey in Alastair Fowler, Conceit-fid Thought: The Interpretation of English Renaissance Poems, 1975, and Jonathan Crewe, Trials of Authorship: Anterior Forms and Poetic Reconstruction from Wyatt to Shakespeare, 1990, and those on Wyatt and Surrey in Maurice Evans, English Poetry in the Sixteenth Century, rev. 1967; Susanne Woods, Natural Emphasis: English Versification from Chaucer to Dryden, 1984; A. C. Spearing, Medieval to Renaissance in English Poetry, 1985; and Elizabeth Heale, Wyatt, Surrey and Early Tudor Poetry, 1998. Scholarship is surveyed in Clyde W. Jentoft, Sir Thomas Wyatt and Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey: A Reference Guide, 1980. Reviews of critical studies are in ELR 19 (1989): 389-401 and 28 (1998): 307.

The Wider World

Richard Hakluyt's great collection The Principal Navigations Voyages Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation was reprinted in twelve volumes, 1903–05; many of the individual texts have been edited in the series published by the Hakluyt Society. Studies of early modern literature of exploration include Stephen Greenblatt, Marvelous Possessions: The Wonder of the New World, 1991; Jeffrey Knapp, An Empire Nowhere: England, America, and Literature from "Utopia" to "The Tempest," 1992; New World Encounters, ed. Greenblatt, 1993; Anthony Grafton, New Worlds, Ancient Texts: The Power of Tradition and the Shock of Discovery, 1992; and Andrew Hadfield, Literature, Travel, and Colonial Writing in the English Renaissance, 1545-1625, 1998. Studies of Tudor and early Stuart travel writing are surveyed in ELR 29 (1999): 326–47. See also entries under Hariot and Raleigh.

Sir Thomas Wyatt

The most useful edition is by Kenneth Muir and Patricia Thomson, Collected Poems, 1969; others are by Richard C. Harrier, 1975; Joost Daalder, 1975; and R. A. Rebholz, 1978. Totle's Miscellany is edited by Hyder E. Rollins, 2 vols., rev. 1965. Letters and life records are included in Muir's biography, The Life and Letters of Sir Thomas Wyatt, 1963; Thomson treats both life and works in Sir Thomas Wyatt and His Background, 1964. Critical studies include E. M. W. Tillyard, The Poetry of Sir Thomas Wyatt, 1929, rpt. 1949; Raymond Southall, The Courtly Maker, 1964; Elizabeth W. Pomeroy, The Eliz- abethan Miscellanies: Their Development and Conventions, 1973; Stephen Greenblatt, Renaissance Self-Fashioning, 1980; Thomas M. Greene, The Light in Troy: Imitation and Discovery in Renaissance Poetry, 1982; and Barbara L. Estrin, Laura: Uncovering Gender and Genre in Wyatt, Donne, and Marvell, 1994. Since the sixteenth century, Wyatt and Surrey have often been discussed in tandem: for some modern instances, see Surrey. Patricia Thomson edited Wyatt: The Critical Heritage, 1974. Reviews of some Wyatt studies are in ELR 19 (1989): 226-46 and 28' (1998): 307-09.

THE EARLY SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

Early-seventeenth-century literature is included in the new Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller, 2002; its several chapters examine the interactions between sites of production, reception, and circulation and the aesthetic and generic features of early modern texts. Other general resources include Thomas N. Corns, ed., The Cambridge Companion to English Poetry, 1993, and Graham Parry, The Intellectual and Cultural Context of English Literature, 1604-1700, 1989. The journal English Literary Renaissance (ELR) publishes "Recent Studies," a survey of new material on individual sixteenth- and seventeenth-century authors and on some literary topics on an ongoing basis; they are updated periodically. In its winter issues, annually, the journal Studies in English Literature publishes "Recent Studies in the English Renaissance," evaluating the past year's publications. These journals regularly carry important new articles on seventeenth-century topics, as do English Literary History, Representations, The Seventeenth Century, Seventeenth Century News, Renaissance Studies, John Donne Journal, George Herbert Journal, Milton Studies, and Milton Quarterly.

Politics, Society, and Political Thought

Some general histories of the seventeenth century or some part of it include Christopher Hill, The Century of Revolution, 1961; Barry Coward, The Stuart Age: A History of England, 1980; Derek Hirst, Authority and Conflict: England, 1603-58, 1986; and Austin Woolrych, Commonwealth to Protectorate, 1982. Interpretation of the causes and progress of the English Revolution is a contested issue. A series of books by Christopher Hill emphasize political, social, and ideological conflict: Puritanism and Revolution, 1958; The World Turned Upside Down, 1972; and The Experience of Defeat, 1984. The "revisionist" view sees this event not as a revolution but as an accidental consequence of politicians' incompetence: it is represented by J. S. Morrill, Seventeenth-Century Britain, 1980; Conrad Russell, The Causes of the English Civil War, 1990, and his Urevolutionary England, 1603—1642, 1990. Some efforts to revise the revisionists include J. P. Sommerville, Politics and Ideology in England, 1603-1640, 1986; Richard Cust and Ann Hughes, eds., Conflict in Early Stuart England: Studies in Religion and Politics, 1603-1642, 1989, and Geoff Eley and William Hunt, eds., Reviving the English Revolution, 1988. Several scholars explore republican and royalist ideas and attitudes before, during, and after the regicide. Johann Sommerville discusses the clash of ideologies in the decades preceding the war in Royalists and Patriots: Politics and Ideologies in England, 1603—1640, 1999. Thomas Corns does the same for the war years and the Interregnum in Uncloistered Virtue, 1992. For royalist writing, see Robert Wilcher, The Writing of Royalism, 2001. David Norbrook has written a wide-ranging study of writers who contributed to the emergence of republican thought and culture in England, Writing the English Republic: Poetry, Rhetoric and Politics, 1627-1660, 1999. Other important studies include Sharon Achinstein, Literature and Dissent in Milton's England, 2003, and Sean Kelsey, Inventing a Republic: The Political Culture of the English Commonwealth, 1649-1653, 1997. Laura Lunger Knoppers has investigated visual and literary representations of the Protector in Constructing Cromwell, 2000.

The complex place of religion, both as doctrine and cultural force, is explored in Keith Thomas, Religion and the Decline of Magic: Popular Beliefs in Sixteenth- and Seventeenth-Century England, 1978; Patrick Collinson, The Religion of Protestants, 1980, and The Birthpangs of Protestant England, 1986; David Underdown, Revel, Riot, and Rebellion: Popidar Politics and Culture in England, 1603—1660, 1985; and Arthur Marotti, Catholicism and Anti-Catholicism in Early Modern English Texts, 1999. David Loewenstein has examined the complex interconnections of radical religion and revolution in several major and minor figures in Representing Revolution in Milton and His Contemporaries: Religion, Politics, and Polemics in Radical Puritanism, 2001. Nigel Smith has studied the rhetoric and assumptions about language of the revolution's radical sects—Quakers, Ranters, Diggers—in Perfection Proclaimed: Language and Literature in English Radical Religion, 1989. Suggestive essays on the interrelation of events, religion, and culture are collected in Kevin Sharpe and Peter Lake, eds., Culture and Politics in Early Stuart England, 1994, and C. McEachern and D. Shuger, eds., Religion and Culture in Renaissance England, 1997.

English society in the seventeenth century was analyzed by the German sociologist Max Weber in an influential essay, 1904, emphasizing the importance of the Protestant doctrine of the calling or vocation for the aspiring capitalist class; that thesis was further developed by R. H. Tawney in Religion and the Rise of Capitalism, 1926, but it has been much disputed, notably by H. R. Trevor-Roper. Books that describe socioeconomic changes and the cultural and intellectual changes produced by England's quickening commercial life include Keith Wrightson, Earthly Necessities: Economic Lives in Early Modern Britain, 2000; Craig Muldrew, The Economy of Obligation, 1998; and David Wooten, ed., Republicanism, Liberty, and Commercial Society, 1649-1776, 1994. Peter Laslett's book The World We Have Lost, 3rd ed., 1984, helps in imagining what life was like in a pre-industrial society. Studies of early modern society of special interest to students of literature include Lawrence Stone, The Family, Sex, and Marriage in England, 1500-1800, 1977; Keith Wrightson, English Society, 1580-1680, 1977; Susan Amussen, An Ordered Society: Gender and Class in Early Modern England, 1988; and Alan Bray, Homosexuality in Renaissance England, 1992. A general study of schools and education in the period is K. Charlton, Education in Renaissance England, 1965.

The material changes in the ways in which literary texts were transmitted have received increased attention in recent years. Books that explore these issues include Elizabeth Eisenstein, The Printing Press as an Agent of Change, 2 vols., 1979; Harold Love, Scribal Publication in Seventeenth-Century England, 1993; Arthur Marotti, Manuscript, Print, and the English Renaissance Lyric, 1995; and Joseph Loewenstein, The Author's Due: Printing and the Prehistory of Copyright, 2002. Several studies explore the way patronage and censorship influenced what was written in the period and how it was understood by contemporaries: Annabel Patterson, Censorship and Interpretation: The Conditions of Writing and Reading in Early Modern England, 1984; Cedric Brown, ed., Patron- age, Politics, and Literary Traditions in England, 1558-1658, 1991; and Stephen Orgel and Guy Lytle, eds., Patronage in the Renaissance, 1981. Joad Raymond has studied the emergence of the newspaper during the revolutionary era as a force in the creation of a public sphere of discourse in The Invention of the Newspaper: English Newsbooks 1641-1649, 1996.

Helpful overviews of political thought in the seventeenth century are to be found in J. G. A. Pocock's seminal works, The Ancient Constitution and the Feudal Law, rev. 1987, and The Machiavellian Moment: Florentine Political Thought and the Atlantic Republican Tradition, 1975; Quentin Skinner's The Foundation of Modern Political Thought, 2 vols., 1978; and Richard Tuck's Philosophy and Government, 1572-1651, 1993. A useful collection of political treatises in the period has been edited by David Wooten, Divine Right and Democracy: An Anthology of Political Writing in Stuart England, 1986. J. H. Burns has edited essays pertaining to the period that are included in The Cambridge History of Political Thought, 1450-1700, 1991.

Literature, Culture, and Politics

Several studies focus on the intellectual and cultural milieu of the period as it affects literature. Inherited views of the universe based on hierarchy, order, and analogy, which were still prevalent in poetic imagery, are set forth in E. M. W. Tillyard's concise though oversimplified account, The Elizabethan World Picture, 1943. Studies focusing on the challenge of the new science include Rupert Hall, The Scientific Revolution, 1500-1800, 1956; William R. Shea, Galileo's Intellectual Revolution, 1972; Hans Blumenberg, The Genesis of the Copernican World, 1987; and Barbara Shapiro, Probability and Certainty in Seventeenth-Century England, 1983. Some sense of the still-powerful influence of the occult—alchemy, magic, hermeticism, and the like—may be gleaned from Wayne Shumaker's The Occult Sciences in the Renaissance, 1972. C. A. Patrides and Raymond Waddington have edited a useful collection of essays on various facets of seventeenth-century society and culture, The Age of Milton: Backgrounds to Seventeenth-Century Literature, 1980. More focused studies of intellectual currents include Debora Shuger, Habits of Thought in the English Renaissance, 1990; Victoria Kahn, Machiavellian Rhetoric: From the Counter-Reformation to Milton, 1994; and John Rogers, The Matter of Revolution: Science, Poetry, and Politics in the Age of Milton, 1996. A fine brief account of court culture in the Jacobean and Caroline eras is by Graham Parry, The Golden Age Restored: The Culture of the Stuart Court, 1603-1642, 1981.

Studies of seventeenth-century literature in relation to political and cultural forces include Leah Marcus, The Politics of Mirth: Jonson, Her- rick, Milton, Marvell, 1986; Aschah Guibbory, Ceremony and Community from Herbert to Milton: Religion and Cultural Conflict in Seventeenth-Century England, 1998; and David Norbrook, Poetry and Politics in the English Renaissance, 1987. Several collections of essays treat particular topics and writers in these terms: Claude Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, eds., The Muses Common-Weale: Poetry and Politics in the Seventeenth-Century, 1988; Kevin Sharpe and Steven Zwicker, eds., The Politics of Discourse: The Literature and History of Seventeenth-Century England, 1987; Kevin Sharpe and Peter Lake, eds., Culture and Politics in Early Stuart England, 1994; and Richard Burt and John M. Archer, eds., Enclosure Acts: Sexuality, Property, and Culture in Early Modern England, 1994.

Analyses focusing especially on the Jacobean era are Jonathan Goldberg, James I and the Politics of Literature, 1983; Curtis Perry, The Making of Jacobean Culture, 1998; and an important collection of essays edited by Linda Levy Peck, The Mental World of the Jacobean Court, 1991. Kevin Sharpe has edited a collection of essays pertaining to the Caroline era, Criticism and Compliment: The Politics of Literature in the England of Charles I, 1987. Studies treating the literature and culture of the revolutionary era focus on Milton, Marvell, and several royalist poets and prose writers: they include Michael Wilding, Dragon's Teeth: Literature in the English Revolution, 1987; Nigel Smith, Literature and Revolution in England, 1640–1660, 1994, which treats the political uses of various genres; Thomas Corns, Uncloistered Virtue: English Political Literature, 1640–1660, 1992; and Steven Zwicker, Lines of Authority: Politics and English Culture, 1649–1689, 1993. Works that attend especially to royalist writers are Raymond Anselment, Loyalist Resolve: Patient Fortitude in the English Civil War, 1988; Lois Potter, Secret Rites and Secret Writing: Royalist Literature, 1641–1660, 1989; and a collection of essays edited by Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, Classic and Cavalier: Essays on Jonson and the Sons of Ben, 1982. Other important essays are edited by Thomas Healy and Jonathan Sawday in Literature and the English Civil War, 1990, and by James Holsten in Pamphlet Wars: Prose in the English Revolution, 1992.

Genre, Style, and Poetics

Valuable perspectives on literary history, the literary institution, and aspects of style in the period are provided in several works. Seventeenth-century critical texts are included in an anthology edited by Brian Vickers, English Renaissance Literary Criticism, 1999. An illuminating and elegant brief account of the place and uses of genre is supplied by Rosalie Colie in The Resources of Kind: Genre-Theory in the Renaissance, 1973. While the category of Metaphysical poets has lost much of its usefulness, Earl Miner's three volumes provide important surveys of the literature of the era: The Metaphysical Mode from Donne to Cowley, 1969; The Cavalier Mode from Jonson to Cotton, 1971; and The Restoration Mode from Milton to Dryden, 1974. George Parfitt has provided a single-volume survey, English Poetry of the Seventeenth Century, 1985. Barbara K. Lewalski, Protestant Poetics and the Seventeenth-Century Religious Lyric, 1979, treats the impact of Protestant theology, sermon theory, and devotional practices on poetics and religious poetry, especially Donne, Herbert, Vaughan, and Traherne. Anthony Low, in Love's Architecture: Devotional Modes in Seventeenth-Century English Poetry, 1978, has studied the religious lyric poets from another perspective, and Ramie Targoff has emphasized the importance of public devotional practices on several poets, especially Herbert, in Common Prayer: The Language of Public Devotion in Early Modern England, 2001. Diane McColley has explored the relationship between the poetic language of several major poets and the music of the period in Poetry and Music in Seventeenth-Century England, 1997. An important collection of essays that reconsiders canonical poets of the period in the light of poststructuralist theory is Soliciting Interpretation: Literary Theory and Seventeenth-Century Poetry, ed. Elizabeth D. Harvey and Katharine E. Maus, 1990. Another impressive essay collection reexamines the category of "wit" in several poets of the period, The Wit of Seventeenth-Century Poetry, ed. Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, 1995.

The styles, varieties, and rhetoric of seventeenth-century prose are treated in several important studies: Maurice Croll, in Style, Rhetoric, and Rhythm, ed. J. M. Patrick et al., 1966; Stanley Fish, Self-Consuming Artifacts: The Experience of Seventeenth-Century Literature, 1972 (Bacon, Burton, Browne, Milton, Bunyan); Joan Webber, The Eloquent "I": Style and Self in Seventeenth-Century Prose, 1973; Roger Pooley, English Prose of the Seventeenth Century, 1590–1700, 1992; and Victoria Kahn, Machiavellian Rhetoric: From the Counter-Reformation to Milton, 1994. In Paradoxia Epidemica, 1966, Rosalie Colie studies the pervasiveness of paradox in texts of all kinds throughout the century.

Important studies of particular genres in relation to seventeenth-century culture include Rosemary Freeman, English Emblem Books, 1948; Paul Delany, British Autobiography in the 17th Century, 1968; Paul Alpers, What Is Pastoral?, 1999; Ellen Z. Lambert, Placing Sorrow: A Study of Pastoral Elegy, 1976; Anthony Low, The Georgic Revolution, 1985; Paul Salzman, English Prose Fiction 1558–1700: A Critical History, 1985; Heather DuBrow, The Happier Eden: The Politics of Marriage in the English

Epithalamion, 1990; Amy Boesky, Founding Fictions: Utopias in Early Modern England, 1996; Alastair Fowler, The Country-House Poem, 1994; and on the same genre, Hugh Jenkins, Feigned Commonwealths: The Country-House Poem and the Fashioning of the Ideal Community, 1998.

Because most scholars of English Renaissance drama consider Tudor and Stuart drama as part of a continuous tradition, many of the books recommended for the study of sixteenth-century drama also include chapters on Jacobean and Caroline plays. Some studies of drama in the Stuart era are Brian Gibbons, Jacobean City Comedy, 1968; Margot Heinemann, Puritanism and Theater: Thomas Middleton and Opposition Drama under the Early Stuarts, 1980; Albert Tricomi, Anticourt Drama in England, 1603-1642, 1987; and Richard Strier and David Bevington, eds., The Theatrical City: Cidure, Theater, and Politics in Post-Reformation England, 1995.

Women's Roles and Writing

An important recovery effort is under way in publishing and studying hitherto unknown or little-studied works by early modern women, sometimes highlighting gender issues, sometimes attending to their self-constructions as patrons and authors, sometimes addressing aesthetic and stylistic matters. Betty Travitsky and Patrick Cullen are publishing in facsimile an ongoing series of published and unpublished writings by women in the period 1500–1640. Some anthologies of writing by women in (or including) the seventeenth century are Betty Travitsky, ed., The Paradise of Women, 1981; Germaine Greer et al., eds., Kissing the Rod: An Anthology of Seventeenth-Century Women's Verse, 1988; Katharine Wilson and Frank J. Warnke, eds., Women Writers of the Seventeenth Century, 1989; and Elspeth Graham et al., eds., Her Own Life: Autobiographical Writings by Seventeenth-Century Englishwomen, 1989. Anita Pacheco has edited a useful Companion to Early Modern Women's Writing, 2002. An annotated bibliography by Hilda Smith and Susan Cardinale, Women and the Literature of the Seventeenth Century, 1900, gives a brief account of all the works by or about women listed in Donald Wing's Short-Title Catalogue of English Books Published between 1641 and 1700. Elaine Hobby, in Virtue of Necessity: English Women's Writing, 1649-88, 1988, discusses women writers and their several genres, with a bibliography. Other important bibliographical resources are Mary Thomas Crane, "Women and the Early Modern Canon: Recent Editions of Works by English Women, 1500–1660," Renaissance Quarterly 51 (1998); and the "Recent Studies" feature, on seventeenth-century women writers, by Elizabeth Hageman and Sara Jayne Steen, in ELR 14 (1984), 18 (1988), and 24 (1994).

Some important studies of women, writing, and gender in the period are Linda Woodbridge, Women and the English Renaissance: Literature and the Nature of Womenkind, 1540–1620, 1984; Margaret Ferguson, Maureen Quilligan, and Nancy Vickers, eds., Rewriting the Renaissance: The Discourses of Sexual Difference in Early Modern England, 1986; Margaret J. M. Ezell, The Patriarch's Wife, 1987; Wendy Wall, The Imprint of Gender: Authorship and Publication in the English Renaissance, 1993; and Mihoko Suzuki, Subordinate Subjects: Gender, the Political Nation, and Literary Form in England, 1588-1688, 2003. Some of the women writers included in NAEL (Lanyer, Speght, Cary, Wroth, Philips, and Cavendish) are treated by Elaine Beilin in Redeeming Eve: Women Writers of the English Renaissance, 1987; by Sara Mendelson in The Mental World of Stuart Women, 1987; by Tina Krontiris in Oppositional Voices: Women as Writers and Translators of Literature in the English Renaissance, 1992; by Barbara K. Lewalski in Writing Women in Jacobean England, 1993; and by Louise Schleiner in Tudor and Stuart Women Writers, 1994. Some important collections of essays including many on these women are Anne M. Haselkorn and Betty Travitsky, eds., The Renaissance Englishwoman in Print: Counterbalancing the Canon, 1990; Helen Wilcox, ed., Women and Literature in Britain, 1500-1700, 1996; Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, eds., Representing Women in Renaissance England, 1997; and Jane Donawerth et al., eds., Women, Writing, and the Reproduction of Cidure, 1998. Phyllis Mack's Visionary Women: Ecstatic Prophecy in Seventeenth-Century England, 1992, highlights the emergence of prophecy as a genre for women, especially during the revolution; and there is a complementary study by Bonnelyn Y. Kunze, Margaret Fell and the Rise of Quakerism, 1994.

Francis Bacon

The standard edition remains The Works of Francis Bacon (English and Latin), 14 vols., ed. James Spedding, Robert Ellis, and Douglas Heath, 1858–74. A fine edition of the essays is that of Michael Kiernan, Essays or Counsels, Civil and Moral, 1989. There is a good edition of The Advancement of Learning and The New Atlantis by Arthur Johnson, 1974. Perez Zagorin, Francis Bacon, 1998 provides an excellent introduction to Bacon's life and thought. Lisa Jardine and Alan Stewart, Hostage to Fortune: The Troubled Life of Sir Francis Bacon, 1999, is a fuller biography. Markku Pelton, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Bacon, 1996, includes essays by a variety of scholars on the whole range of Bacon's interests. Useful critical works include Brian Vickers, Francis Bacon and Renaissance Prose, 1968; Lisa Jardine, Francis Bacon: Discovery and the Art of Discourse, 1974; John C. Briggs, Francis Bacon and the Rhetoric of Nature, 1989; and John Leary, Francis Bacon and the Politics of Science, 1994. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 17 (1987): 351-71.

Sir Thomas Browne

The standard complete edition remains The Works of Sir Thomas Browne, ed. Geoffrey Keynes, 4 vols., 1964. Important studies include Jonathan Post, Sir Thomas Browne, 1987, and Daniela Haverstein, Democratizing Sir Thomas Browne, 1999, which explores his influence in the later seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. There are chapters on Browne in Stanley Fish, Self-Consuming Artifacts, 1972; Anne Drury Hall, Ceremony and Civility in English Renaissance Prose, 1991; and Howard Marchitello, Narrative Meaning in Early Modern England, 1997. C. A. Patrides edited a collection of essays, Approaches to Sir Thomas Browne, 1982, and Browne is included in the studies of seventeenth-century prose noted above. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 19 (1989): 118-29.

Robert Burton

A scholarly edition of The Anatomy of Melancholy in four volumes has been prepared by Thomas C. Faulkner et al., 1989-98. Holbrook Jackson published a useful edition of that work in 1972, with paraphrases or translations of the Latin and Greek quotations, a glossary, and Burton's footnotes. The classic modern study of melancholy is Saturn and Melancholy by Raymond Kilbansky, Erwin Panofsky, and Fritz Saxl, 1964. Also useful is Bridget Gelbert Lyons, Voices of Melancholy: Studies in Literary Treatments of Melancholy in Renaissance England, 1971. A good general introduction to Burton's life and writing is Michael J. O'Connell, Robert Burton, 1986. Critical studies include Lawrence Babb, Sanity in Bedlam, 1959, rpt. 1977; Devon Hodges, Renaissance Fictions of Anatomy, 1985; and Patricia Vicari, The View from Minerva's Tower: Learning and Imagination in the Anatomy of Melancholy, 1989. Burton figures prominently in Mark Breitenburg, Axious Masculinity in Early Modern England, 1996. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 17(1987): 243-51.

Thomas Carew

The edition by Rhodes Dunlap, The Poems of Thomas Carew, 1949, contains all the poems, Carew's single masque, and a note on musical settings for his poems. Edward Selig published a study of Carew in 1958, The Flourishing Wreath: A Study of Thomas Carew, and Lynn Sadler, a Twayne biography, Thomas Carew, in 1979. There are useful essays on Carew in collections noted above: by Diana Benet in The Muses Common-Weale, ed. Summers and Pebworth; by Kevin Sharpe in The Politics of Discourse, 1987, and in his Criticism and Compliment, 1987. There is also a chapter on Carew in L. E. Semler, The English Mannerist Poets and the Visual Arts, 1998.

Elizabeth Cary

There is a facsimile edition of The Tragedy of Mariam, 1613, prepared by A. C. Dunstan and W. W. Greg. Margaret Ferguson and Barry Weller have edited that work, together with a near-contemporary biography, The Tragedy of Mariam: The Fair Queen of Jewry with The Lady Falkland Her Life by One of Her Daughters, 1994. The history usually attributed to Cary, The History of the Life, Reign, and Death of Edward II, is included in Diane Purkiss, ed., Renaissance Women: The Plays of Elizabeth Cary; The Poems of Aemilia Lanyer, 1994. Her letters have been edited, with a substantial introductory essay on her life, by Heather Wolfe, Elizabeth Cary, Lady Falkland: Her Life and Letters, 2001. Cary is discussed in several of the studies and collections of essays noted above (Beilin, Lewalski, Schleiner, Haselkorn and Travitsky). There is a chapter on Mariam in Karen Raber, Dramatic Difference: Gender, Class, and Genre in the Early Modern Closet Drama, 2001. Some other important essays are Margaret Ferguson, "The Spectre of Resistance," in Staging the Renaissance: Reinterpretations of Elizabethan and Jacobean Drama, ed. David Kastan and Peter Stallybrass, 1991; and Maureen Quilligan, "Staging Gender: William Shakespeare and Elizabeth Cary," in Sexuality and Gender in Early Modern Europe: Institutions, Texts, Images, ed. James Grantham Turner, 1993.

Margaret Cavendish

Kate Lilley has edited Margaret Cavendish: "The Description of a New World Called The Blazing World" and Other Writings, 1992; The Blazing World is also included in Paul Salzman's Anthology of Seventeenth-Century Fiction, 1992, and he discusses that work in his English Prose Fiction, 1985, as do Amy Boesky, in Founding Fictions, 1996; Marina Leslie, in Renaissance Utopias and the Problem of History, 1998; and Mihoko Suzuki, in Subordinate Subjects, 2003. Two of Cavendish's books have been reprinted in facsimile, Sociable Letters, 1969, and Poems and Fancies, 1972. There are selections in Wilson and Warnke, eds. Women Writers of the Seventeenth Century, and in Greer et al., eds., Kissing the Rod. Ann Shaver has edited plays by Cavendish in "Convent of Pleasure" and Other Plays, 1999. The best biography is by Kathleen Jones, A Glorious Fame: The Life of Margaret Cavendish, Duchess of Newcastle, 1623-1673, 1988. Book-length critical treatments of Cavendish include Emma Rees, Margaret Cavendish: Gender, Genre, Exile, 2003, and Stephen Cleuas, ed., A Princely Brave Woman: Essays on Margaret Cavendish, 2003. Some useful articles are Catherine Gallagher, "Embracing the Absolute: The Politics of the Female Subject in Seventeenth-Century England," Genders 1 (1988), and Eve Keller, "Producing Petty Gods: Margaret Cavendish's Critique of Experimental Science," English Literary History 64 (1997).

Edwafd Hyde, Earl of Clarendon

The standard edition is The History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, 6 vols., 1888, rpt. 1992. Clarendon's autobiography, The Life of Edxvard, Earl of Clarendon, 12 vols., was published in 1759. In 1978 Gertrude Huehns edited a useful volume of selections from the History and the Life. In 1983 George Miller published a Twayne biography, Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon. Some important studies are Brian Wormald, Clarendon: Politics, History, and Rebellion, 1951; R. W. Harris, Clarendon and the English Revolution, 1983; Richard Ollard, Clarendon and His Friends, 1987; and Phillip Hicks, Neoclassical History and English Cidture: From Clarendon to Hume, 1998.

Abraham Cowley

Cowley's English Poems was edited by A. R. Waller, 1905; his Essays and Other Prose Writings by A. B. Gough, 1915. The first two volumes of a projected six-volume complete edition, edited by Thomas Calhoun et al., appeared in 1989. Samuel Johnson's "Life of Cowley," in his Lives of the Poets, 1779–81, was influential in setting terms for analyzing poetic style in Cowley, Donne, and other poets sometimes labeled "Metaphysical." A biography by A. H. Nethercot, The Muses' Hannibal, appeared in 1931. Some useful studies are R. B. Hinman, Abraham Cowley's World of Order, 1960; J. Taaffe, Abraham Cowley, 1972; David Trotter, The Poetry of Abraham Cowley, 1979; and Tom Mason, "Abraham Cowley and the Wisdom of Anacreon," Critical Quarterly 19 (1990): 103–37. Corns, Uncloistered Virtue, and Wilcher, The Writing of Royalism, have helpful chapters on Cowley.

Richard Crashaw

The standard edition is The Works of Richard Crashaw, ed. L. C. Martin, 2nd ed., 1957; George W. Williams edited the Complete Poetry in 1970, rpt. 1974. Two studies that relate Crashaw's life to the historical and religious milieu of the period are Paul Parrish, Richard Crashaw, 1980, and Thomas Healy, Richard Crashaw, 1986. Influential studies of Crashaw's baroque style and Counter-Reformation poetics are Austin Warren, Richard Crashaw: A Study in Baroque Sensibility, 1957; George Williams, Image and Symbol in the Sacred Poetry of Richard Crashaw, 1963; Robert Peterson, The Art of Ecstasy: Teresa, Bernini, and Crashaw, 1970; and Anthony Raspa, The Emotive Image: Jesuit Poetics in the English Renaissance, 1983. Crashaw figures prominently in Richard Rambuss's book on sexuality and the sacred, Closest Devotions, 1998. Louise Schleiner examines the influence of contemporary song on Crashaw's prosody in The Living Lyre in English Verse from Elizabeth through the Restoration, 1984. Two useful collections of essays are Robert M. Cooper, ed., Essays on Richard Crashaw, 1979, and John R. Roberts, ed., New Perspectives on the Life and Art of Richard Crashaw, 1990. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 21 (1991): 425–5.

John Donne

The two-volume edition of Donne's Poems edited by H. J. C. Grierson, 1912, is still important, though we now have newer Oxford editions of Donne's several genres: Helen Gardner, ed., The Divine Poems, 1952, rev. 1978; Gardner, ed., The Elegies and the Songs and Sonnets, 1965; Wesley Milgate, ed., The Satires, Epigrams, and Verse Letters, 1967; and Milgate, ed., The Epithalamiums, Anniversaries, and Epicedes, 1978. George Potter and Evelyn Simpson have edited The Sermons of John Donne, 10 vols. 1953–62. Donne's meditations were edited by Anthony Raspa, John Donne: Devotions upon Emergent Occasions, 1975. There are several single-volume editions of the English poems, one by C. A. Patrides, 1985, rpt. 1994; another by A. L. Clements, 1966, rev. 1992. A Donne Variorum edition is in progress, 1995—, under the general editorship of Gar] Stringer; vol. 2, The Elegies; vol. 6, Anniversaries and Epicedes; and vol. 8, Epigrams, Epithalamions, Epitaphs, Etc., have been published. The first biography of Donne was by Izaak Walton, 1640. John Donne: A Life, 1970, is the standard biography. John Carey, John Donne: Life, Mind, and Art, 1981, offers a challenging account of the psychological and social factors influencing Donne's life choices and his poetry. Arthur Marotti, in John Donne: Coterie Poet, 1986, locates Donne in his social milieu and places his poems in relation to the various audiences they addressed.

T. S. Eliot's essay "The Varieties of Metaphysical Poets," in Selected Essays, 1917–1932, 1932, rpt. 1969, was influential in setting terms for analyzing Donne over several decades; Cleanth Brook's reading of "The Canonization" in his Well Wrought Urn, 1947, is a classic of the New Criticism. Donne is discussed in many accounts of the period (e.g., Miner, Metaphysical Mode; Lewalsld, Protestant Poetics; and Goldberg, James I and the Politics of Literature) and has invited several valuable individual studies: Donald Guss, John Donne: Petrarchist, 1966; Murray Roston, The Soul of Wit, 1974; Barbara K. Lewalski, Donne's Anniversaries and the Poetry of Praise, 1973; Stevie Davies, Reassessing John Donne, 1986; Terry Sherwood, Fulfilling the Circle, 1986; and Meg Lota Brown,

Donne and the Politics of Conscience, 1995. Many significant critical essays are collected in A. J. Smith, ed., John Donne: Essays in Celebration, 1972, and John Donne: Title Critical Heritage, 1975-1995, 1995; Harold Bloom, ed., John Donne and the Seventeenth-Century Metaphysical Poets, 1986; Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, eds., The Eagle and the Dove: Reassessing John Donne, 1986; and Arthur Marotti, ed., Critical Essays on John Donne, 1994.

Robert Filmer

A good recent collection of Filmer's works is Johann P. Sommerville, ed., "Patriarcha" and Other Writings, 1991. Filmer is discussed in many general accounts of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century political theory (see above) and in more detail by Gordon Schochet, The Authoritarian Family and Political Attitudes in Seventeenth-Century England: Patriarchalism and Political Thought, 1998.

Lady Anne Halkett

Halkett's Memoirs were edited by John Loftis in 1979. She is discussed in Antonia Fraser's The Weaker Vessel, 1984, Margaret Bottrall's Ever! Man a Phoenix: Studies in Seventeenth-Century Autobiography, 1958, and Mary Beth Rose's collection Women in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, 1986.

George Herbert

The standard edition is The Works of George Herbert, ed. F. E. Hutchinson, rev. 1945; C. A. Patrides edited a compact edition of The English Poems, 1974. Izaak Walton wrote a contemporary Life of George Herbert, 1670; there are modern biographies by Amy Charles, A Life of George Herbert, 1977; by Stanley Stewart, George Herbert, 1986; and by Christina Malcolmson, George Herbert: A Literary Life, 2004. Besides the general studies mentioned above (e.g., Lewalski, Protestant Poetics, and Low, Love's Architecture: Devotional Modes), several important critical books on Herbert deal with the interrelation of Herbert's religion and his art: Rosemund Tuve, A Reading of George Herbert, 1952; Joseph Summers, George Herbert: His Religion and His Art, 1966; Stanley Fish, The Living Temple: George Herbert and Catechizing, 1978; Diana Benet, Secretary of Praise: The Poetic Vocation of George Herbert, 1984; Chana Bloch, Spelling the Word: George Herbert and the Bible, 1985; Tern' Sherwood, Herbert's Prayerful Art, 1989; Richard Strier, Love Known: Theology and Experience in George Herbert's Poetry, 1982; Gene E. Veath, Reformation Spirituality: The Religion of George Herbert, 1985; Harold E. Toliver, Herbert's Christian Narratives, 1993; and Christina Malcolmson, Heart-Work: George Herbert and the Protestant Ethic, 1999. Helen Vendler, in The Poetry of George Herbert, 1975, focuses on Herbert's exquisite art. Michael Schoenfeldt, in Prayer and Power: George Herbert and Renaissance Courtiership, 1991, explores the interdependence of social and religious discourse, to advance a cultural poetics of Herbert's lyrics. There are several essay collections all or partly on Herbert: Claude Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, eds., "Too Rich to Clothe the Sunne": Essays on George Herbert, 1980; Summers and Pebworth, eds., "Bright Shoots of Everlastingness": The Seventeenth-Century Religious Lyric, 1987; and C. A. Patrides, ed., George Herbert: The Critical Heritage, 1983. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 18 (1988): 460-75. Robert Herrick

The standard edition is by L. C. Martin, The Poetical Works of Robert Herrick, 1956; J. Max Patrick also edited the Complete Poetry of Robert Herrick, in 1963. There are biographical accounts by Roger Rollin, Robert Herrick, 1966, rpt. 1992, and George W. Scott, Robert Herrick, 1974. Important critical studies include Robert Deming, Ceremony and Art: Robert Herrick's Poetry, 1974; Gordon Braden, The Classics and English Poetry: Three Case Studies, 1978; Ann Baynes Coiro, Robert Herrick's Hesperides and the Epigram Book Tradition, 1988; as well as essays by Leah Marcus in The Politics of Mirth, 1986, and by Aschah Guibbory in The Muses' Common-Weale, ed. Summers and Pebworth. A collection of essays edited by Roger Rollin and J. Max Patrick, Trust to Good Verses: Herrick Tercentenary Essays, appeared in 1978. Herrick is treated at some length in Corns, Uncloistered Virtue. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 29 (1999): 462-71.

Thomas Hobbes

The classic edition is by Sir William Molesworth, English Works, 11 vols., Opera Philosophica, 5 vols., 1839-45. A useful student's edition of the Leviathan is by C. P. Macpherson, 1968. See also the Norton Critical Edition. A delightful seventeenth-century biographical sketch is in John Aubrey's Brief Lives. Biographies include Mariam Reik, The Golden Lands of Thomas Hobbes, 1977, and Arnold Rogow, Thomas Hobbes: Radical in the Service of Reason, 1986. Important studies of Hobbes's thought and rhetoric include Michael Oakeshott, Hobbes on Civil Association, 1975; David Johnston, The Rhetoric of "Leviathan": Thomas Hobbes and the Politics of Cultural Transformation, 1986; Charles Catalupo, A Literary Leviathan: Thomas Hobbes' Masterpiece of Language, 1991; Richard Tuck, Hobbes, 1989; Quentin Skinner, Visions of Politics, 2002; Noel Malcolm, Aspects of Hobbes, 2002; and Vickie Sullivan, Machiavelli, Hobbes, and the Formation of Liberal Republicanism in England, 2004.

Lucy Hutchinson

The best edition of Lucy Hutchinson's Memoir of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson, with a Frag- ment of Autobiography is by N. W. Keeble, 1995. David Norbrook has edited her unpublished hexameral epic, Order and Disorder, 2001, which has suggestive analogues to Milton's Paradise Lost. He has also published and discussed twenty-three of her poems preserved in manuscript, in "Lucy Hutchinson's 'Elegies' and the Situation of the Republican Woman Writer (with Text)," ELR 27 (1997): 468-521, as well as a poem almost certainly by her on Oliver Cromwell, in "Lucy Hutchinson versus Edmund Waller: An Unpublished Reply to Waller's A Panegyrick to My Lord Protector," The Seventeenth Century 11 (1996): 61-86. Her translation of Lucretius's De Rerum Natura has been edited by Hugh de Qurhen, 1996. Useful studies of Hutchinson's writing include N. H. Keeble, "The Colonel's Shadow: Lucy Hutchinson, Women's Writing and the Civil War," in Literature and the English Civil War, ed. Healy and Sawday, 1990; and Francis Barker et al., eds., 1642: Literature and Power in the Seventeenth Century, 1981.

Ben Jonson

A monumental edition of Ben Jonson's Works was edited by C. H. Herford and Percy and Evelyn Simpson, 11 vols., 1925-52. The Yale edition and the paperback series known as the New Mermaid provide good modernized and annotated versions of the major plays (one play to a volume). Robert M. Adams's Ben Jonson's Plays and Masques, 1979, includes some plays and masques with critical essays. Stephen Orgel has edited The Complete Masques, 1969. Handy editions of the verse are by W. B. Hunter, The Complete Poetry of Ben Jonson, 1979, and George Parfitt, Ben Jonson: The Complete Poems, 1975. There is an edition of Timber by Ralph Walker, 1953. David Riggs has written a fine biography, Ben Jonson: A Life, 1989.

Important critical studies include Richard Helgerson, Self-Crowned Laureates, 1983; Katharine E. Maus, Ben Jonson and the Roman Frame of Mind, 1984; Anne Barton, Ben Jonson, Dramatist, 1984; Robert N. Watson, Ben Jonson's Parodic Strategies: Literary Imperialism in the Comedies, 1987; Bruce Boehrer, The Fury of Men's Gidlets: Ben Jonson and the Digestive Canal, 1997; and Joseph Loewenstein, Ben Jonson and Possessive Authorship, 2002. Works that deal especially with Jonson's poetry are Sara Van de Berg, The Action of Ben Jonson's Poetry, 1987, and Robert C. Evans, Ben Jonson and the Poetics of Patronage, 1989. Don E. Wayne, Penshurst: The Semiotics of Place and the Poetics of History, 1984, locates Jonson's poem "To Penshurst" in its social and architectural context; Raymond Williams, The Country and the City, 1975, places it within a broad social history of movements affecting agriculture and the land.

Stuart court masques, and Jonson's major contribution to them, are analyzed in two essay collections: David Lindley, ed., The Court Masque, 1984, and David Bevington and Peter Holbrook, eds., The Politics of the Stuart Court Masque, 1998, as well as by Stephen Orgel in The Illusion of Power: Political Theater in the English Renaissance, 1975. The fascinating reproduction of drawings and designs for the masques published by Stephen Orgel and Roy Strong in Inigo Jones: The Theatre of the Stuart Court, 2 vols., 1973, gives some sense of what masques looked like in presentation. Collections of critical essays on Jonson include Jonas A. Barish, ed., Ben Jonson: A Collection of Critical Essays, 1983; Jennifer Brady and W. H. Herendeen, eds., Ben Jonson's 1616 Folio, 1990; James Hirsh, ed., New Perspectives on Ben Jonson, 1997; and Richard Harp and Stanley Stewart, eds., The Cambridge Companion to Ben Jonson, 2000.

Aemilia Lanyer

Susanne Woods has edited The Poems of Aemilia Lanyer: "Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum," 1993, and has also analyzed her life and works in Lanyer: A Renaissance Poet in Her Context, 1999. The important collection of essays edited by Marshall Grossman, Aemilia Lanyer: Gender, Genre, and the Canon, 1998, includes a valuable annotated bibliography. There are chapters on Lanyer in Beilin, Redeeming Eve; Krontiris, Oppositional Voices; Lewalski, Writing Women in Jacobean England; Schleiner, Tudor and Stuart Women Writers; Wall, The Imprint of Gender: Authorship and Publication in the English Renaissance, and Donawerth et al., eds., Women, Writing, and the Reproduction of Culture, 1998.

Richard Lovelace

C. H. Wilkinson edited the Poems, 1930, rpt. 1968. Manfred Weidhorn published a biography, Richard Lovelace, 1970; and both the life and the works are treated in Cyril Hartman, The Cavalier Spirit and Its Influence on the Life and Work of Richard Lovelace, 1970. Commentary can be found in Miner, The Cavalier Mode; in Raymond Anselment, "Stone Walls' and 'Iron Bars': Richard Lovelace and Seventeenth-Century Prison Literature," Renaissance and Reformation 17 (1993); and in two essay collections edited by Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Pebworth, Classic and Cavalier: Essays on Jonson and the Sons of Ben, 1982, and The Wit of Seventeenth-Century Poetry, 1995.

Andrew Marvell

Nigel Smith has produced a scrupulously edited and annotated edition of Marvell's poems, The Poems of Andrew Marvell, 2003, which is now standard. Also now standard is the new Prose Works of Andrew Marvell in two volumes, edited by Martin Dzelzainis and Annabel Patterson, 2003, which set those works impressively in their contexts. There are compact editions of Marvell's Complete Poetry<sup>1</sup> by George de F. Lord, 1968, rpt. 1984, and Elizabeth Story Donno, 1972. Robert Ray has published An Andrew Marvell Companion, 1998, and Elizabeth Donno has surveyed the critical tradition in Andrew Marvell: The Critical Heritage, 1978. Biographical studies include Nicholas Murray, World Enough and Time: The Life of Andrew Marvell, 2000, and Thomas Wheeler, Andrew Marvell-Revisited, 1996. Influential studies of his political attitudes and writing in connection with his poetry include John M. Wallace, Destiny His Choice: The Loyalty of Andrew Marvell, 1979; Annabel Patterson, Marvell and the Civic Crown, 1978, and A'arvell: The Writer in Public Life, 1999; Warren Chernaik, The Poet's Time: Politics and Religion in the Work of Marvell, 1983; essays in Warren Chernaik and Martin Dzelzainis, eds., Marvell and Liberty, 1999; and the important essay by David Norbrook on the "Horatian Ode," in Healy and Sawday, Literature and the English Civil War, 1990. Important analyses of Marvell's poetic art include Rosalie Colie's elegant and learned study, "My Echoing Song": Andrew Marvell's Poetry of Criticism, 1970; Donald Friedman's Marvell's Pastoral Art, 1970; and Christine Rees's The Judgment of Marvell, 1989. Thomas Healy has edited a useful collection of essays, Andrew Marvell, 1998; others appear in several tercentenary tributes: Kenneth Friedenreich, ed., Tercentenary Essays in Honor of Andrew Marvell, 1977; C. A. Patrides, ed., Approaches to Marvell, 1978; and R. L. Brett, ed., Andrew Marvell: Essays on the Tercentenary of His Death, 1979. Still other important essays are included in Sharpe and Zwicker, eds., Politics of Discourse; Marcus, Politics of Mirth; and Zwicker, Lines of Authority. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 22 (1992).

John Milton

The Columbia Milton, The Works of John Milton, ed. F. A. Patterson et al., 18 vols., 1931–40, with its invaluable two-volume index, is the only complete edition of all the poetry and prose, English and Latin. The Yale edition, Complete Prose Works of John Milton, ed. Don M. Wolfe et al., 8 vols., 1953–82, supplies useful historical introductions to all the prose. The Riverside Milton, ed. Roy Flannagan, 1998, contains all the poetry and much of the English prose, with updated introductions and a bibliography. John Leonard's paperback, John Milton: The Complete Poems, 1998, supplies a good text and useful notes, as does the Longman edition in two volumes: John Carey, ed., John Milton: Complete Shorter Poems, 1968, rev. 1997, and Alastair Fowler, ed. Paradise Lost, 1966, rev. 1998. See also the Norton Critical Edition of Paradise Lost. For the prose, C. A. Patrides's paperback edition, John Milton: Selected Prose, 1985, offers a judicious selection. Three volumes of the Variorum Commentary on the Poems of John Milton, ed. Douglas Bush et al., 1970–75, have been published, but the volume on Paradise Lost is still in process. In 1987 C. A. Patrides provided a useful Annotated Critical Bibliography of John Milton.

Barbara K. Lewalski has published a new critical biography of Milton, The Life of John Milton: A Critical Biography, 2000, rev. 2003, which traces his interconnections with the history and culture of his age and provides extended analyses of his major poems and prose. William Riley Parker's important Milton: A Biography, 2 vols., 1968, has been edited and updated by Gordon Campbell, 1996. David Masson's The Life of John Milton, 6 vols, plus index, 1859–91, is still a treasure trove of information about the poet and the period. Christopher Hill's Milton and the English Revolution, 1977, has spearheaded an ongoing effort to locate Milton more precisely among his revolutionary contemporaries. Cedric C. Brown's brief biography, John Milton: A Literary Life, 1995, offers a useful introduction to the man and his works. Milton is psychoanalyzed by William Kerrigan in The Sacred Complex: On the Psychogenesis of Paradise Lost, 1983, and by John T. Shawcross in John Milton: The Self and the World, 1993. The five volumes of J. Milton French's The Life Records of John Milton, 1949–58, rpt. 1966, gather much primary material for the life. Gordon Campbell's A Milton Chronology, 1997, reexamines and adds to these materials. Aids to the study of Milton include the nine-volume Milton Encyclopedia, ed. William Hunter et al., 1978–83, with bibliographies and updates in vol. 9; Dennis Danielson, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Milton, 1989, rev. 1999; and Thomas Corns, ed., A Companion to Milton, 2003, which highlights contemporary issues in Milton studies.

Valuable critical studies that address all or some considerable part of Milton's career and writing include the following: Louis L. Martz, Milton: Poet of Exile, 1980; Marshall Grossman, "Authors to Themselves": Milton and the Revelation of History, 1987; Joan Bennett, Reviving Liberty: Radical Christian Humanism in Milton's Great Poems, 1989; Sharon Achinstein, Milton and the Revolutionary Reader, 1994; Laura Lunger Knoppers, Historicizing Milton: Spectacle, Power, and Poetry in Restoration England, 1994; Michael Lieb, Milton and the Culture of Violence, 1994; Lana Cable, Carnal Rhetoric: Milton's Iconoclasm and the Poetics of Desire, 1995; John Rumrich, Milton Unbound, 1996; David Loewenstein, Representing Revolution in Milton and His Contemporaries, 2001; and Stanley Fish, How Milton Works, 2001. Stephen M. Fallon has studied Milton in relation to contemporary philosophers wrestling with issues of materialism in Milton among the Philosophers: Poetry and Materialism in Seventeenth-Century England, 1991. Stephen B. Dobrinski considers Milton's authorial practices in relation to contemporary printing practices in Milton, Authorship, and the Book Trade, 1999.

Various approaches to Milton over the centuries can be sampled in two volumes edited by John Shawcross, Milton: The Critical Heritage, 1628-1731, 1970, and Milton, 1732-1801: The Critical Heritage, 1972, and in Joseph A. Wittreich, ed., The Romantics on Milton, 1970. Useful essay collections include Mary Nyquist and Margaret Ferguson, eds., Re-membering Milton: Essays on the Texts and Traditions, 1988; Mario Di Cesare, ed., Milton in Italy, 1991; Annabel Patterson, ed., John Milton, 1992; Diana Benet and Michael Lieb, eds., Literary Milton: Text, Pretext, Context, 1994; Paul G. Stanwood, ed., Of Poetry and Politics: New Essays on Milton and His World, 1995; David Armitage, Armand Himy, and Quentin Skinner, eds., Milton and Republicanism, 1995; Stephen B. Dobranski and John P. Rumrich, eds., Milton and Heresy, 1998; and Graham Parry and Joad Raymond, eds., Milton and the Terms of Liberty, 2002. Milton's views of women and various feminist issues are addressed in several of these collections, and centrally in Diane McColley, Milton's Eve, 1983; James Grantham Turner, One Flesh: Paradisal Marriage and Sexual Relations in the Age of Milton, 1987; Joseph A. Wittreich, Feminist Milton, 1987; and Julia M. Walker, ed., Milton and the Idea of Woman, 1988.

Stella Revard has written an excellent account of Milton's shorter poems, including the Latin poems, Milton and the Tangles of Neaera's Hair: The Making of the 1645 Poems, 1997. Rosamond Tuve's Images and Themes in Five Poems by Milton, 1957, can still illuminate Milton's most important shorter poems. Cedric C. Brown treats Milton's Comus and "Lycidas" in their social and political contexts in John Milton's Aristocratic Entertainments, 1985. C. A. Patriides has edited a useful collection of essays on "Lycidas," Milton's "Lycidas": The Tradition and the Poem, rev. 1983, and that poem is at the center of Joseph A. Wittreich's Visionary Poetics: Milton's Tradition and His Legacy, 1980. Milton's prose is discussed in several books and essays: Thomas A. Kranides, The Fierce Equation, 1964; Joan Webber, The Eloquent "I": Style and Self in Seventeenth-Century Prose, 1968; Stanley Fish, Self-Consuming Artifacts, 1972; Keith W. Staveley, The Politics of Milton's Prose Style, 1975; Michael Lieb and John Shawcross, eds., Achievements of the Left Hand, 1975; Thomas N. Corns, The Development of Milton's Prose Style, 1982; and David Loewenstein and James G. Turner, eds., Poetry, Politics, and Hermeneutics in Milton's Prose, 1990.

Modern criticism of Paradise Lost still engages with issues of interpretation and generic tradition raised in C. S. Lewis's A Preface to Paradise Lost, 1942; C. M. Bowra's From Virgil to Milton, 1945; and William Empson's provocative attack on the figure of God in the poem, Milton's God, rev. 1965. A classic study of Milton's theology in reference to the epic is Maurice Kelley's This Great Argument: A Study of Milton's "De Doctrina Christiana" as a Gloss upon "Paradise Lost," 1941. Dennis R. Danielson, Milton's Good God: A Study in Literary Theodicy, 1982, revisits that issue. Some important earlier critical books include Joseph Summers, The Muse's Method: An Introduction to "Paradise Lost," 1962; Christopher Ricks, Milton's Grand Style, 1963; Northrop Frye, The Return to Eden, 1966; Stanley Fish's very influential reader-response criticism, Surprised by Sin: The Reader in "Paradise Lost," 1967; John Steadman, Epic and Tragic Structure in "Paradise Lost," 1976; Joan Webber, Milton and His Epic Tradition, 1979; and Barbara K. Lewalski, "Paradise Lost" and the Rhetoric of Literary Forms, 1985. The titles of some recent books point to new critical concerns: David Quint, Epic and Empire: Politics and Generic Form from Virgil to Milton, 1992; Jason Rosenblatt, Torah and Law in "Paradise Lost," 1994; J. Martin Evans, Milton's Imperial Epic: "Paradise Lost" and the Discourse of Colonialism, 1996; B. Rajan and E. Sauer, eds., Milton and the Imperial Vision, 1999; and Karen Edwards, Milton and the Natural World, 1999. Placing Milton's epic in relation to relevant visual traditions is the burden of a beautifully illustrated book by Roland M. Frye, Milton's Imager: and the Visual Arts: Iconographic Traditions in the Epic Poems, 1978, and of a broader study by Diane McColley, A Gust for Paradise: Milton's Eden and the Visual Arts, 1993.

Milton's brief epic, Paradise Regained, is the subject of Barbara K. Lewalski's book Milton's Brief Epic: The Genre, Meaning and Art of "Paradise Regained," 1966; the poem is treated at some length in David Loewenstein, Milton and the Drama of History, 1990; Knoppers, Historicizing Milton; Quint, Epic and Empire; Mary Ann Radzinowicz, Milton's Epics and the Book of Psalms, 1989; and a special issue of Milton Studies edited by David Loewenstein and Albert Labriola, "Paradise Regained": Genre, Politics, Religion, 2003. Some important works dealing with Milton's tragedy, Samson Agonistes, include William R. Parker, Milton's Debt to Greek Tragedy in "Samson Agonistes," 1947; Anthony Low, The Blaze of Noon: A Reading of "Samson Agonistes," 1968; and with reference to competing traditions of interpreting the Samson story, in Joseph A. Wittreich, Interpreting "Samson Agonistes," 1986. Mary Ann Radzinowicz's book Toward "Samson Agonistes": The Growth of Milton's Mind, 1978, treats themes and concerns in all his writing as leading toward his great tragedy. Mark R. Kelley and Joseph A. Wittreich have edited a collection of essays on the tragedy, Altering Eyes: New Perspectives on "Samson Agonistes," 2002.

Katherine Philips

Patrick Thomas has edited The Collected Works of Katherine Philips: The Matchless Orinda, 1993. Her translations of Corneille and other French works were edited by Ruth Little, 1991. There are two biographies: Philip W. Souer, The Matchless Orinda, 1931, and Patrick Thomas, Katherine Philips ("Orinda") 1988. Useful critical studies include Harriette Andreadis, "The Sapphic-Platonics of Katherine Philips, 1632—1664," Signs 15 (1989); Elizabeth Hageman, "Katherine Philips: The Matchless Orinda," in Women Writers of the Renaissance and Reformation, ed. Katharina M. Wilson, 1987; and Arlene Stiebel, "Subversive Sexuality: Masking the Erotic in Poems" by Katherine Philips and Aphra Behn," in Renaissance Discourses of Desire, ed. Claude J. Summers and Ted-Larry Peabworth, 1993.

Rachel Speght and Joseph Swetnam

Barbara K. Lewalski has edited A Mouzell for Melastomus and Mortalities Memorandum, with a Dream Prefixed, in The Polemics and Poems of Rachel Speght, 1996. Swetnam's tract and several responses to it are included in Charles Butler, Female Replies to Swetnam the Woman-Hater, 1995. Tracts in the Jacobean controversy about women are included in Simon Shepherd, ed., The Women's Sharp Revenge, 1985, and Katherine Henderson and Barbara McManus, eds., Half Humankind: Contexts and Texts of the Controversy about Women in England, 1540—1640, 1985. Speght is discussed by Woodbridge in Women and the English Renaissance; by Ann Rosalind Jones in The Renaissance Englishwoman in Print, ed. Haselkorn and Travitsky; and by Lewalski in Writing Women in Jacobean England.

Sir John Suckling

Suckling's plays and poems have been edited by L. A. Beurline and Thomas Clayton, The Works of John Suckling, 2 vols., 1971. Charles L. Squier published a compact life and works, John Suckling, 1978. Suckling is discussed in Miner, The Cavalier Mode; Joseph H. Summers, The Heirs of Donne and Jonson, 1970; George Parfitt, English Poetry of the Seventeenth Century, 1985; and Summers and Peabworth, eds., Classic and Cavalier: Essays on Jonson and the Sons of Ben.

Thomas Traherne

The standard edition is Thomas Traherne: Centuries, Poems, Thanksgivings, ed. H. M. Margoliouth, 2 vols., rev. 1972. There is a biography by Gladys Wade, Thomas Traherne, 1944, and a Twayne life and works by Malcolm Day, Thomas Traherne, 1983. Significant critical studies include A. L. Clements, The Mystical Poetry of Thomas Traherne, 1969; Stanley Stewart, The Expanded Voice: The Art of Thomas Traherne, 1970; Sharon Seelig, The Shadow of Eternity:

Belief and Structure in Herbert, Vaughan, and Traherne, 1981; and Graham Dowell, Enjoying the World: The Rediscovery of Thomas Traherne, 1990.

Henry Vaughan

The standard edition is The Works of Henry Vaughan, ed. L. C. Martin, rev. 1957; French Fogle edited the Complete Poetry in 1964, and Alan Rudrum did so in 1976. F. E. Hutchinson published a biography in 1947, Henry Vaughan: A Life and Interpretation. Critical studies include E. C. Pettit, Of Paradise and Light, 1960; James D. Simmonds, Masques of God, 1972; Thomas O. Calhoun, Henry Vaughan: The Achievement of "Silex Scintillans," 1981; and Noel K. Thomas, Henry Vaughan: Poet of Revelation, 1986. Jonathan Post's Henry Vaughan: The Unfolding Vision, 1982, offers a comprehensive overview. Alan Rudrum edited Essential Articles for the Study of Henry Vaughan in 1987. Vaughan is discussed in Lewalski, Protestant Poetics; Low, Devotional Modes; and A. L. Clements, Poetry of Contemplation: John Donne, George Herbert, Henry Vaughan and the Modern Period, 1990.

Edmund Waller

The only complete edition is by G. Thorn-Drury, 1893, rpt. 1968. Jack G. Gilbert published a Twayne biography, Edmund Waller, in 1979. Critical studies include A. W. Alison, Toward an Augustan Poetic, 1962; W. L. Chernaik, The Poetry of Limitation, 1968; and A. B. Chambers, Andrew Marvell and Edmund Waller: Seventeenth-Century Praise and Restoration Satire, 1991. Waller is also discussed at some length in David Norbrook, Writing the English Revolution, 1999.

Izaak Walton

Geoffrey Keynes edited a useful edition of all Walton's works in 1929. The Compleat Angler, 1653-1676 was edited by Jonquil Bevan, 1983, and the fifth edition, 1653, was edited by Arthur Rackham, 1995. P. G. Stanvood has written a Twayne life and works, Izaak Walton, 1998. Walton's Life of Donne is discussed in Judith H. Anderson's Biographical Truth: The Representation of Historical Persons in Tudor-Stuart Writing, 1984, and his place in the emergence of biography is the subject of Jessica Martin's Walton's Lives: Conformist Commemorations and the Rise of Biography, 2001. Important critical studies include David Novarr, The Making of Walton's Lives, 1958; John R. Cooper, The Art of "The Compleat Angler," 1968; and there are discussions in Miner, Cavalier Mode; Wilding, Dragon's Teeth; and Zwicker, Lines of Authority. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 17 (1987).

John Webster

F. L. Lucas edited Webster's Complete Works, 4 vols., 1927, rpt. 1967, and reedited His Duchess of Malfi and Webster's The White Devil in 1959. David Gumby et al. published an old-spelling critical edition of Webster's Works, 2 vols., 1995-2003. The Revels Plays editions of The Duchess of Malfi, 1997, and The White Devil, 1996, have been edited by John Russell Brown. Jonathan Dollimore and Alan Sinfield edited Webster's Selected Plays, 1983. There is a biography by M. C. Bradbrook, John Webster: Citizen and Dramatist, 1980, and a Twayne biography, John Webster, by Margaret Loftus Raynald, 1989. Book-length studies of The Duchess of Malfi include Clifford Leech, Webster: "The Duchess of Malfi," 1963, and Joyce Peterson, Curs'd Example: "The Duchess of Malfi" and Commonweal Tragedy, 1978; and Malfi is treated along with Othello, King Lear, and The White Devil in Dympna Callahan, Women and Gender in Renaissance Tragedy, 1989. General critical studies of Webster include Ralph Berry, The Art of John Webster, 1972; Charles R. Forker, Skid! Beneath the Skin: The Achievement of John Webster, 1986; Lee Bliss, The World's Perspective: John Webster and the Jacobean Drama, 1983; and Christina Luckyi, A Winter's Snake: Dramatic Form in the Tragedies of John Webster, 1989. Don D. Moore surveys criticism in The Critical Heritage: John Webster, 1981, and R. B. Heldworth reprints selected essays in Webster: "The White Devil" and "The Duchess of Malfi," 1975. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 12 (1982): 369-75.

Gerrard Winstanley

The most nearly complete edition is The Writings of Gerrard Winstanley, ed. George H. Sabine, 1941, rpt. 1965. Christopher Hill's collection, "The Law of Freedom" and Other Writings of Gerard Winstanley, 1973, rev. 1983, includes an excellent introduction. A biographical account is included in David Petegorsky's Left-Wing Democracy in the English Civil War, 1940. Winstanley figures prominently in Hill's The World Turned Upside Down, 1972. His ideas and writing are analyzed by T. Wilson Hayes in Winstanley the Digger, 1979; by George A. Shulman in Radicalism and Reason: The Political Thought of Gerrard Winstanley, 1989; by Nigel Smith in Perfection Proclaimed, 1989; by John Rogers in The Matter of Revolution, 1996; and by David Loewenstein in Representing Revolution in Milton and His Contemporaries, 2001.

Mary Wroth

Josephine Roberts edited Wroth's Poems, 1983, and The First Part of "The Countess of Montgomery's Urania," 1995. Her edition of part 2 of the Urania, from the manuscript in the Newberry Library, was completed by Suzanne Gossett and Janel Mueller. There is a modernized edition of Wroth's Poems edited by R. E. Pritchard, 1996. Wroth's pastoral drama, Love's Victory, was edited by Michael Brennan, 1989. There are biographical accounts in Roberts's introductions and in Kim Walker, Women Writers of the English Renaissance, 1996. Critical studies include May Nelson Paulissen, The Love Sonnets of Lady Mary Wroth: A Critical Introduction, 1982; Gary Waller, The Sidney Family Romance: Mary Wroth, William Herbert, and the Early Modern Construction of Gender, 1993; Naomi Miller, Changing the Subject: Marj' Wroth and Figurations of Gender in Early Modern England, 1996; and Sheila T. Cavanagh, Cherished Torment: The Emotional Geography of Lady Mary Wroth's "Urania," 2001. Miller and Waller have also edited a collection of essays, Reading Mary Wroth: Representing Alternatives in Early Modern England, 1991. Wroth's works are also treated by Maureen Quilligan in Unfolded Tales: Essays on Renaissance Romance, ed. George Logan and Gordon Teskey, 1989; by several hands in The Renaissance Englishwoman in Print, ed. Haselkorn and Travitsky; and in Lewalski's Writing Women in Jacobean England. Recent studies are surveyed in ELR 18 (1988) and 24 (1994).

THE RESTORATION AND THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

In recent decades, historians have placed less emphasis on stories about the ruling classes and their political conflicts and more on the economic and social forces that shape the lives of ordinary people. A good example of this approach is The Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, 3 vols., 1992; volume 2, by T. W. Heyck, covers the period from 1688 to 1870. A fuller account is provided by J. R. Jones, Country and Court: England, 1658-1714, 1978; W. A. Speck, Stability and Strife: England, 1714-1760, 1977; and Ian Christie, Wars and Revolutions: Britain, 1760-1815, 1982. Linda Colley, Britons, 1992, studies the forging of a new national identity. J. H. Plumb, England in the Eighteenth Century, 1950, describes the structure of society, and Roy Porter, English Society in the Eighteenth Century, rev. 1990, is a mine of information. John Brewer, The Pleasures of the Imagination, 1997, is a wide-ranging history of popular culture. The life and manners of the age are surveyed in Johnson's England, 2 vols., ed. A. S. Turberville, 1933; Dorothy Marshall, English People in the Eighteenth Century, 1956; R. B. Schwartz, Daily Life in Johnson's England, 1983; and Paul Langford, A Polite and Commercial People, 1989. The Birth of a Consumer Society<sup>1</sup>, 1982, by Neil McKendrick, Brewer, and

J. H. Plumb, traces the rise of modern commercialization in the eighteenth century. Useful guides to the historical and cultural contexts of literature include A. R. Humphreys, The Augustan World, 1954; Donald Greene, The Age of Exuberance, 1970; The Eighteenth Century<sup>1</sup>, ed. Pat Rogers, 1978; and James Sambrook, The Eighteenth Century, 1700-1789, 2nd ed., 1993.

On the intellectual background of the period, Sir Leslie Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century, 2 vols., 1876, remains valuable; so do A. O. Lovejoy, The Great Chain of Being, 1942, and Essays in the History of Ideas, 1948. Basil Willey, The Eighteenth Century Background, 1940, studies ideas about nature, and Keith Thomas, Man and the Natural World, 1983, shows the development of a modern sensibility between 1500 and 1800. Gordon Rupp, Religion in England, 1688-1791, 1986, is dependable. Volumes 4 to 6 of F. C. Copleston, History of Philosophy, 1960, deal with the period from Descartes to Kant; Peter Gay, The Enlightenment: An Interpretation, 2 vols., 1969, forcefully defends the philosophers of the Age of Reason. Jurgen Habermas, The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere, 1962, trans. 1989, includes an extremely influential discussion of the British public sphere in the period as a model case. The works of J. G. A. Pocock, especially Virtue, Commerce, and History, 1985, have strongly influenced discussions of the period's political, social, and economic thought. J. W. Johnson, The Formation of English Neo-Classical Thought, 1967, and J. M. Levine, The Battle of the Bools: History and Literature in the Augustan Age, 1991, study the ways that writers came to terms with the past. Burton Feldman and R. D. Richardson, The Rise of Modern Mythology 1680-1860, 1972, and Gerald Newman, The Rise of English Nationalism, 1987, deal with important new directions of thought. Steven Shapin, The Scientific Revolution, 1996, is a brief clear survey. Valuable studies of the influence of scientific ideas include R. F. Jones, Ancients and Moderns, 1936; Marjorie Nicolson, Newton Demands the Muse, 1946, and Science and Imagination, 1956; and W. P. Jones, The Rhetoric of Science, 1966. Myra Reynolds, The Learned Lady in England, 1650-1760, 1920, still useful, should be supplemented by Sylvia Myers, The Bluestocking Circle, 1990. The reflection in eighteenth-century literature of Britain's imperial and colonial enterprises has generated much interest in recent years. Books on this topic include Laura Brown, The Ends of Empire, 1993, and Felicity Nussbaum, Torrid Zones, 1995, both of which focus on the role of women in colonialist discourses; Srinivas Aravamudan, Tropicopolitans, 1999, which presents readings of Behn's Oroonoko, Swift's Gulliver's Travels, Johnson's Rasselas, and Equiano's Interesting Narrative; Suvir Kaul, Poems of Nation, Anthems of Empire, 2000; and Bridget Orr, Empire on the English

Stage, 1660-1714, 2001. Sensibility, a set of new ideas and feelings associated especially with women, is the subject of several good books, including Jean Hagstrum, Sex and Sensibility, 1980; Janet Todd, Sensibility: An Introduction, 1986; John Mullan, Sentiment and Sociability, 1988; and G. J. Barker-Benfield, The Culture of Sensibility, 1992. Changes in the literary marketplace are illuminated by Pat Rogers, Grub Street, 1972; Paula McDowell, The Women of Grub Street, 1998; Mark Rose, Authors and Owners: The Invention of Copyright, 1993; and Dustin Griffin, Literary Patronage in England, 1650-1800, 1996. Martin Price, To the Palace of Wisdom: Studies in Order and Energy from Dryden to Blake, 1964; Paul Fussell, The Rhetorical World of Augustan Humanism, 1965; W. J. Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet, 1970; John Sitter, Literary Loneliness in Mid-Eighteenth-Century England, 1982; Howard Weinbrot, Britannia's Issue: The Rise of British Literature from Dryden to Ossian, 1993; and Stuart Sherman, Telling Time: Clocks, Diaries, and English Diurnal Form, 1660-1785, 1996, are all thoughtful and stimulating studies that relate ideas to literary art.

Good surveys of the literature of the age include George Sherburn, "The Restoration and Eighteenth Century," in A Literary History of England, ed. A. C. Baugh, rev. 1967, and Dryden to Johnson, ed. Roger Lonsdale, rev. 1987, vol. 4 of the Sphere History of Literature. Far more detailed are three volumes of the Oxford History of English Literature: James Sutherland, English Literature of the Late Seventeenth Century, 1969; Bonamy Dobree, English Literature in the Early Eighteenth Century, 1700-1740, 1959; and John Butt and Geoffrey Carnall, English Literature in the Mid-Eighteenth Century, 1979. On women writers they need to be supplemented by Janet Todd, A Dictionary of British and American Women Writers, 1660-1800, 1985.

Among books that deal with a single literary mode, James Sutherland, A Preface to Eighteenth-Century Poetry, 1948, is a deft introduction, and Eric Rothstein, Restoration and Eighteenth-Century Poetry, 1660-1780, 1981, is a fresh, informative survey. The Cambridge Companion to Eighteenth-Century Poetry, ed. John Sitter, 2001, offers a variety of perspectives. Other useful studies include Ian Jack, Augustan Satire, 1952; Earl Miner, The Restoration Mode from Milton to Dryden, 1974; Rachel Trickett, The Honest Muse, 1974; Margaret Doody, The Daring Muse, 1985; and Robert Griffin, Wordsworth's Pope, 1995. Two anthologies edited by Roger Lonsdale, The New Oxford Book of Eighteenth Century Verse, 1984, and Eighteenth-Century Women Poets, 1989, have sparked an interest in neglected poems about daily life; Joyce Fullard edited Eighteenth-Century Women Poets 1660-1800, 1990; and David Fairer and Christine Gerrard edited an annotated anthology, Eighteenth-Century Poetry, 2nd ed., 2004.

On drama, a good introduction is R. W. Bevis, English Drama: Restoration and Eighteenth Century, 1660-1789, 1988. Fuller accounts appear in Allardyce Nicoll, A History of Restoration Drama 1660—1700, A History of Early Eighteenth-Century Drama, 1700—1750, and A History of Late Eighteenth-Century Drama, 1750-1800, rev. 1952; and The Revels History of Drama in English, Vol. 5, 1660-1750, 1976, and Vol. 6, 1750-1880, 1975. An invaluable store of detailed information is The London Stage, 1660-1800, 11 vols., 1960-68, the critical introductions of which have been gathered in five paperback books. Six of the most important plays of the period, together with critical commentary and background material on theaters, staging, and audience, are edited by Scott McMillin in a Norton Critical Edition, Restoration and Eighteenth-Century Comedy, 2nd ed., 1997. The Broadview Anthology of Restoration and Early Eighteenth-Century Drama, gen. ed. J. Douglas Canfield, 2003, brings together forty-one plays. Two collections, Restoration Dramatists, ed. Earl Miner, 1966, and Restoration Drama, ed. John Loftis, 1966, provide essays in criticism by various writers; Loftis also analyzed Comedy and Society from Congreve to Fielding, 1959. Walter Graham, English Literary Periodicals, 1930, is a survey. Letter writing was an important eighteenth-century genre, discussed in The Familiar Letter in the Eighteenth Century, ed. Howard Anderson, P. B. Daghljan, and Irvin Ehrenpreis, 1966, and Bruce Redford, The Converse of the Pen, 1986. Another important genre, history writing, is examined in Karen O'Brien, Narratives of Enlightenment, 1997. D. A. Stauffer, English Biography before 1700, 1930, and The Art of Biography in Eighteenth-Century England, 2 vols., 1941, are standard surveys; William H. Epstein, Recognizing Biography, 1987, is a challenging theoretical study. Bunyan figures prominently in two books on autobiography: John N. Morris, Versions of the Self, 1966, and Felicity Nussbaum, The Autobiographical Subject, 1989. Patricia Spacks, Imagining a Self, 1976, discusses conceptions of personal identity in eighteenth-century autobiographies and novels.

The Cambridge Companion to the Eighteenth-Century Novel, ed. John Richetti, 1996, is a good general survey. E. A. Baker, The History of the English Novel, vols. 3—5, 1930—34, assembles many details. A. D. McKillop, The Early Masters of English Fiction, 1956, and Clive Probyn, English Fiction of the Eighteenth Century, 1700-1789, 1987, offer good introductions to major novelists. Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel, 1957, an influential study of Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding, set off a long discussion that has been joined by Jane Spencer, The Rise of the Woman Novelist, 1986; Michael McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1987; Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction, 1987; J. Paul Hunter, Before Novels, 1990; Homer O. Brown, Institutions of the English Novel from Defoe to Scott, 1997; and William B. Warner, Licensing Entertainment, 1998. Interesting studies of special aspects of fiction include Lenard Davis, Factual Fictions, 1983; Terry Castle, Masquerade and Civilization, 1986; John Bender, Imagining the Penitentiary, 1987; Carol Kay, Political Constructions, 1988; and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story, 1994, which has chapters on Oroonoko and Frances Burney.

The most comprehensive account of eighteenth-century criticism is vol. 4 of The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson, 1997. J. E. Spingarn, Critical Essays of the Seventeenth Century, vols. 2 and 3, 1908 (the preface is still useful), and Scott Elledge, Eighteenth-Century Critical Essays, 2 vols., 1961, are valuable collections. R. S. Crane's "Neo-Classical Criticism," in A Dictionary of World Literature, ed. J. T. Shipley, 1943, has not been surpassed. A survey of major critical movements is provided by James Engell, Forming the Critical Mind: Dryden to Coleridge, 1989. Rene Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism 1750-1950, vol. 1, 1955, and W. K. Wimsatt and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History, 1957, review important issues of theory and aesthetics. Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society, 1983, examines the changing meanings of critical terms. A feminist perspective is offered by Marilyn Williamson, Raising Their Voices: British Women Writers, 1650—1750, 1990. The issues explored by Samuel H. Monk's classic study, The Sublime, 1935, were taken up by many later critics, among them David Morris, The Religious Sublime, 1972; Steven Knapp, Personification and the Sublime, 1985; and James Noggle, The Skeptical Sublime, 2001. The theory of satire has also been a perennial source of interest, most recently in John Sitter, Arguments of Augustan Wit, 1991, and Dustin Griffin, Satire: A Critical Reintroduction, 1994. Though primarily concerned with Romantic theory, M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp, 1953, delves deeply into eighteenth-century critical ideas.

The relation of literature to other arts has been the subject of many instructive studies. Jean Hagstrum, The Sister Arts, 1958, compares paintings with poems; John Dixon Hunt, The Figure in the Landscape, 1977, deals with poetry, painting, and gardening; and Richard Wendorf, The Elements of Life, 1990, compares biography with portrait-painting. Lawrence Lipking discusses the first histories of the arts in The Ordering of the Arts in Eighteenth-Century England, 1970; Ronald Paulson, Breaking and Remaking, 1989, explores aesthetic practice from 1700 to 1820; and Murray Roston analyzes Changing Perspectives in Literature and the Visual Arts 1650-1820, 1990. B. Sprague Allen, Tides of English Taste 1619-1800, 2 vols., 1937, on architecture, gardening, and decoration, and Sir Kenneth Clark, The Gothic Revival, 2nd ed., 1950, on architecture, chronicle significant changes in style.

Good collections of criticism were edited by James L. Clifford, Eighteenth-Century English Literature: Modern Essays in Criticism, 1959, and Leopold Damrosch, Modern Essays on Eighteenth-Century Literature, 1988. Essays that explore new theoretical approaches are collected by Felicity Nussbaum and Laura Brown, The New Eighteenth Century, 1987. Studies in English Literature devotes its summer issue to the Restoration and the eighteenth century and includes an article reviewing important work published in the preceding year. Finally, for elaborate bibliographies and reviews of eighteenth-century studies, the student may consult the bibliography of English literature, 1660—1800, that has appeared annually since 1926 in Philological Quarterly and, since 1976, in yearly volumes, The Eighteenth Century: A Current Bibliography.

Joseph Addison and Sir Richard Steele

There is no scholarly edition of the collected works. Donald F. Bond's editions of The Spectator, 5 vols., 1965, and The Tatler, 3 vols., 1987, are both superb. The Commerce of Everyday Life, ed. Erin Mackie, 1998, provides cultural contexts for selected essays. John Stephens edited The Guardian, 1982. The Letters of Joseph Addison was edited by Walter Graham, 1941. Peter Smithers, The Life of Joseph Addison, 1968, is the standard biography. Edward and Lillian Bloom survey Addison's views of society in Joseph Addison's Sociable Animal, 1971. Calhoun Winton, Captain Steele: The Early Career of Richard Steele, 1964, and Sir Richard Steele, M. P.: The Later Career, 1970, compose a fine biography. Rae Blanchard edited Steele's Correspondence, 1941, Tracts and Pamphlets, 1944, Occasional Verse, 1952, and other lesser works. Plays was edited by Shirley S. Kenny, 1971. Richmond P. Bond, The Tatler: The Making of a Literary Journal, 1971, is a good analysis. Erin Mackie, Market a la Mode, 1997, analyzes fashions and consumerism as presented by the Tatler and the Spectator.

Mary Astell

Bridget Hill edited selected writings in The First English Feminist, 1986, and Patricia Springborg edited Political Writings, 1996, and A. Serious Proposal to the Ladies, 1997. Ruth Perry, The Celebrated Mary Astell, 1986, is a fine biography that puts Astell in the context of her times; it supersedes Florence M. Smith's pioneering Mary Astell, 1912. Hilda L. Smith, Reason's Disciplines, 1982, includes a good section on Astell.

Aphra Behn

Janet Todd edited The Works of Aphra Behn, 7 vols., 1992-96. The Norton Critical Edition of Oroonoko, ed. Joanna Lipking, 1997, includes relevant historical backgrounds and criticism. The paucity of reliable facts about Behn's life prevents any biography from being authoritative, but Maureen Duffy, The Passionate Shepherdess, 1977, is worth reading; and Janet Todd, The Secret Life of Aphra Behn, 1997, is full of interesting speculations and fresh information. Wylie Sypher, Guinea's Captive Kings, 1942, puts Oroonoko in the context of antislavery literature. Mary Ann O'Donnell, Aphra Behn: An Annotated Bibliography, 1986, is a thorough review of primary and secondary sources through 1985. Jane Spencer, Aphra Behn's Afterlife, 2000, explores Behn's cultural influence, and Derek Hughes, The Theatre of Aphra Behn, 2001, discusses her plays and theatrical career.

James Boswell

Modern revaluations of Boswell began with the publication of The Private Papers of James Boswell from Malahide Castle, ed. Geoffrey Scott and Frederick A. Pottle, 18 vols., 1928-34. Pottle described the history of the papers in Pride and Negligence, 1981. A trade edition of Boswell's Journals, 14 vols., 1950-89, has valuable introductions and notes. The Letters, ed. C. B. Tinker, 2 vols., 1924, need to be supplemented by the recovered Correspondence of James Boswell, 1966-97, of which seven volumes have been published. The best edition of the Life of Johnson is L. F. Powell's revision of G. B. Hill's edition, 6 vols., 1934-64. A good one-volume edition by R. W. Chapman and J. D. Fleeman, 1982, is available in paperback.

F. A. Pottle, James Boswell, The Earlier Years, 1740-1769, 1966, and Frank Brady James Boswell, The Later Years, 1769-1795, 1984, are the two halves of the standard biography, judicious and well informed. Peter Martin wrote a valuable one-volume Life of James Boswell, 2000. Pottle, The Literary Career of James Boswell, 1929, and Mary Hyde, The Impossible Friendship: Boswell and Mrs. Thrale, 1972, are both useful. B. H. Bronson, "Boswell's Boswell," in Johnson and Boswell, 1944, is a wise and sympathetic study; J. L. Smith-Dampier, Who's Who in Boswell?, 1935, is a helpful guide through the Life of Johnson and Adam Sisman, Boswell's Presumptuous Task, 2001, explores the making of the Life. Greg Clingham edited a collection of essays, Neiv Light on Boswell, 1991.

John Bunyan

Bunyan was a prolific writer: Part II of The Pilgrim's Progress, dealing with the journey of Christian's wife and children, appeared in 1684; The Life and Death of Mr. Bad-man in 1680; The Holy War in 1682. But these major works form only a small part of all his writings.

Christopher Hill, A Tinker and a Poor Man:

John Bunyan and His Church, 1628—1688, 1989, is a vigorous, informative life; and Glimpses of Glory, 2002, by Richard Greaves, treats Bunyan's life and works in detail. The critical edition of The Pilgrim's Progress is by J. B. Wharey, 1928, revised by Roger Sharrock, 1960. Sharrock also edited Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners, 1962, and, with James Forrest, The Holy War, 1980, and The Life and Death of Mr. Badman, 1988. Interesting modern studies include Henri A. Talon, John Bunyan, The Man and His Work, 1951, a translation from the French; U. Milo Kaufmann, The Pilgrim's Progress and Traditions in Puritan Meditation, 1966; Michael Davies, Graceful Reading, 2002; and a collection of essays edited by N. H. Keeble, John Bunyan: Conventicle and Parnassus, 1988.

Edmund Burke

There have been two important recent biographies of Burke: Conor Cruise O'Brien, The Great Melody, 1992, and F. P. Lock, Edmund Burke, 1998. A multivolume complete edition of The Writings and Speeches of Edmund Burke, under the general editorship of Paul Langford, began appearing in 1981 (volumes 2 and 3 contain speeches pertaining to America). A smaller collection, Pre-Revolutionary Writings, 1993, was edited by Ian Harris. Harvey C. Mansfield Jr. edited the 10-volume Correspondence of Edmund Burke, 1958—78, and the more manageable Selected Letters of Edmund Burke, 1984. Among the many books pertaining to the literary dimensions of Burke's political writings, of special interest are Christopher Reid, Edmund Burke and the Practice of Political Writing, 1985; Tom Furniss, Edmund Burke's Aesthetic Ideology, 1993; and Frans De Bruyn, The Literary Genres of Edmund Burke, 1994.

Frances Burney

The Diary and Letters were first edited in a truncated version by Charlotte Barrett, Burney's niece, 7 vols., 1842—46. The original texts of The Journals and Letters of Fanny Burney (Madame d'Arblay), 1791-1840, 12 vols., were superbly edited by Joyce Hemlow et al., 1972—84. Several volumes of The Early Journals and Letters of Fanny Burney, 1768—1791, which will eventually fill ten to twelve volumes, were edited by Lars Troide et al., 1988—2003. There is no standard edition of the novels, but Peter Sabor edited The Complete Plays of Frances Burney, 2 vols., 1995. See the Norton Critical Edition of Evelina. Biographies include Joyce Hemlow, The History of Fanny Burney, 1958; Margaret Doody's critical biography, Frances Burney: The Life in the Works, 1988; Janice Thaddeus, Frances Burney, 2000; and Claire Harman, Fanny Burney, 2001.

Samuel Butler

Materials for a full-length biography of Butler do not exist; George Wasserman, Samuel "Hudi- bras" Butler, 1989, summarizes what is known. Of editions of Hudibras, Zachary Grey's, 2 vols., 1744, is still useful for its illustrative notes; the best modern edition is John Wilders's, 1967. Characters, ed. C. W. Daves, 1970, and Prose Observations, ed. Hugh de Quehen, 1979, are invaluable for studying Butler's opinions; Rene Lamar edited Satires and Miscellaneous Poetry and Prose, 1928. E. A. Richards, Hudibras in the Burlesque Tradition, 1937, is useful. Ian Jack, Augustan Satire, 1952, and Blanford Parker, The Triumph of Augustan Poetics, 1998, include excellent essays on Butler.

William Collins

The Works of Collins, which amount to only one slim volume, were well edited by Richard Wendorf and Charles Ryskamp, 1979. Lonsdale's edition (see Gray) has copious notes. P. L. Carver, The Life of a Poet, 1967, is the fullest biography. Wendorf, William Collins and Eighteenth-Century English Poetry, 1981, is a fine critical study.

William Congreve

Congreve's Complete Works were edited by Montague Summers, 4 vols., 1923; a new edition is forthcoming. Herbert Davis edited the Plays, 1967. The best biography is J. C. Hodges, William Congreve the Man, 1941. Julie S. Peters analyzes the relation of plays to texts in Congreve, the Drama, and the Printed Word, 1990. Maximilian Novak's William Congreve, 1971; Harold Love's Congreve, 1975; and Arthur Hoffman, Congreve's Comedies, 1993, are good critical introductions. Early criticism of Congreve was collected by Alexander Lindsay and Howard Erskine-Hill, 1989. Later criticism is abundant in books on Restoration drama; for example, T. H. Fujimura, The Restoration Comedy of Wit, 1952; N. N. Holland, The First Modern Comedies, 1959; Ian Donaldson, The World Upside Down: Comedy from Jonson to Fielding, 1970; Harriet Hawkins, Likenesses of Truth in Elizabethan and Restoration Drama, 1972; Robert Hume, The Development of English Drama in the Late Seventeenth Century, 1976; and Derek Hughes, English Drama 1660-1700, 1996.

William Cowper

The Poems, 3 vols., was expertly edited by John D. Baird and Charles Ryskamp, 1980-95. James Sambrook's edition of The Task and Selected Other Poems, 1994, has useful notes. James King and Ryskamp edited Cowper's Letters and Prose Writings, 5 vols., 1979—86, and one volume of Selected Letters, 1989. King, William Cowper: A Biography, 1986, is the best full life; Ryskamp's fine William Cowper of the Inner-Temple, Esq., 1959, ends in 1768. Useful critical studies include Morris Golden, In Search of Stability: The Poetry of William Cowper, 1960; Vincent Newey, Cowper's Poetry, 1982; Martin Priestman, Cowper's Task, 1983; and the last chapter of Donald Davie, The Eighteenth-Century Hymn in England, 1993.

George Crabbe

Crabbe's biography was written by his son, George, in 1834. It was reedited by E. M. Forster, 1932, and by Edmund Blunden, 1947. The Complete Poetical Works, ed. Norma Dalrymple-Champneys and Arthur Pollard, 3 vols., 1988, is the standard edition. Howard Mills edited Tales (1812) and Other Selected Poems, 1967; and T. C. Faulkner edited Selected Letters and Journals, 1985. Lilian Haddakin, The Poetry of Crabbe, 1955; Oliver Sigworth, Nature's Sternest Painter, 1965; Peter New, George Crabbe's Poetry, 1976; and Frank Whitehead, George Crabbe: A Reappraisal, 1995, are essays in criticism.

Daniel Defoe

Paula Backscheider, Daniel Defoe: His Life, 1989, is a comprehensive biography. Maximilian Novak, Daniel Defoe: Master of Fictions, 2001, generously surveys his life and writings. James Sutherland has written a good short life, Defoe, 1950, and a critical study, Daniel Defoe, 1971. As P. N. Furbank and W. R. Owens stress in The Canonisation of Daniel Defoe, 1988, and in their Critical Bibliography of Daniel Defoe, 1998, too little is known about what Defoe actually wrote, and there is no good scholarly edition of the works. The Letters were edited by George Healey, 1955. Most books on the early English novel contain significant chapters on Defoe; see especially, Robert Mayer, Historical and the Early English Novel, 1997. Full-length studies include John Richetti, Daniel Defoe, 1987 (a good brief survey), and Defoe's Narratives, 1975; Novak, Economics and the Fiction of Daniel Defoe, 1962, and Defoe and the Nature of Man, 1963; G. A. Starr, Defoe and Casuistry, 1971; Peter Earle, The World of Defoe, 1976; and Ian Bell, Defoe's Fiction, 1985.

Three of Defoe's novels are in the Norton Critical Editions series: Moll Flanders, ed. Edward Kelley, 1974; Robinson Crusoe, ed. Michael Shinagel, rev. 1993; and A Journal of the Plague Year, ed. Paula Backscheider, 1992.

John Dryden

James A. Winn's John Dryden and His World, 1987, is the best biography. G. R. Noyes's edition of the Poetical Works, 2nd ed., 1950, includes a good biographical sketch; and Samuel Johnson's Life of Dryden is still worth reading. A fine scholarly edition of the Works, launched in 1956, under the general editorship first of E. N. Hooker, then H. T. Swedenberg, and lately Alan Roper, has reached twenty volumes. Keith Walker has edited a useful selected Works, 1987. The poems were edited by James Kinsley, 4 vols., 1958, and the essays by W. P. Ker, 2 vols., 1900, and George Watson, 2 vols., 1962. Paul Hammond's new edition of the poems has useful notes; the first two volumes appeared in 1995.

Important modern criticism includes Arthur Hoffman, John Dryden's Imagery, 1962; Alan Roper, Dryden's Poetic Kingdoms, 1965; and Earl Miner, Dryden's Poetry, 1967. David Hopkins, John Dryden, 1986, is a good introduction. Steven Zwicker studied Politics and Language in Dryden's Poetry, 1984. The standard work on Dryden's philosophical and religious ideas is Phillip Harth, Contexts of Dryden's Thought, 1968, and Harth also analyzed the politics of Absalom and Achitophel in Pen for a Party, 1993. Two analyses are Robert Hume, Dryden's Criticism, 1970, and Edward Pechter, Dryden's Classical Theory of Literature, 1975. John C. Aden, The Critical Opinions of John Dryden, A Dictionary, 1963, compiles his thought under convenient headings. James Winn, When Beauty Fires the Blood, 1992, explores the arts in the context of Dryden's works; he also edited Critical Essays on John Dryden, 1997.

Olaudah Equiano

A facsimile of the first edition of the Interesting Narrative was published by Paul Edwards, 2 vols., 1969. Equiano's later revisions of the Narrative and other writings were edited, with useful notes, by Vincent Carretta, 1995. Carretta includes Equiano as well as other eighteenth-century black authors in two good anthologies: Unchained Voices, 1996, and Genius in Bondage, 2001, edited with Philip Gould. Angelo Costanzo, Surprising Narrative: Olaudah Equiano and the Beginnings of Black Autobiography, 1987; Keith Sandiford, Measuring the Moment: Strategies of Protest in Eighteenth-Century Afro-English Writing, 1988; and Peter Fryer, Staying Power: The History of Black People in Britain, 1984, place Equiano amid the debates of his time. See also the Norton Critical Edition of The Narrative.

Anne Finch, Countess of Winchelsea

Myra Reynolds added a long biographical introduction to her valuable edition of the Poems, 1903, which needs to be supplemented by The Anne Finch Wellesley Manuscript Poems, ed. Barbara McGovern and Charles Hinnant, 1998. McGovern wrote a good critical biography, Anne Finch and Her Poetry, 1992. Hinnant, The Poetry of Anne Finch, 1994, is an essay in interpretation. Ann Messenger, Pastoral Tradition and the Female Talent, 2001, includes a strong discussion of Finch.

John Gay

David Nokes, John Gay: A Profession of Friendship, 1995, is an up-to-date life. Vinton Dearing and Charles Beckwith edited Gay's Poetry and Prose, 2 vols., 1974; John Fuller, the Dramatic Works, 2 vols., 1983; and C. F. Burgess, the Letters, 1966. W. E. Schultz, Gay's "Beggars' Opera," 1923, and Calhoun Winton, John Gay and the London Theatre, 1993, provide useful historical information. Critical studies include Sven Armens, John Gay, Social Critic, 1954, and John Gay and the Scriblerians, ed. Peter Lewis and Nigel Wood, 1988.

Oliver Goldsmith

The Collected Works of Oliver Goldsmith, ed. Arthur Friedman, 5 vols., 1966, is standard. The best biography is Ralph M. Wardle, Oliver Goldsmith, 1957. Kathleen C. Balderston edited the Collected Letters, 1928. The notes in Lonsdale's edition of the Poems (see Gray) are valuable. Ricardo Quintana, Oliver Goldsmith, 1967, and Peter Dixon, Oliver Goldsmith Revisited, 1991, are useful critical surveys. Andrew Swarbrick edited a collection of essays, The Art of Oliver Goldsmith, 1984. Raymond Williams, The Country and the City, 1973, includes an influential section on The Deserted Village.

Thomas Gray

The poems of Gray, Collins, and Goldsmith were edited, with informative notes, by Roger Lonsdale, 1969. The standard edition of Gray's Works remains that of Edmund Gosse, 4 vols., rev. 1902–06; of the Correspondence, that of Paget Toynbee and Leonard Whibley, 3 vols., 1935; of the poems, that of H. W. Starr and J. R. Hendrickson, 1966. R. W. Ketton-Cremer, Thomas Gray, 1955, is a valuable biography; Robert Mack, Thomas Gray, 2000, contains much detail. Among critical studies, Henry Weinfield, The Poet without a Name: Gray's Elegy and the Problem of History, 1991, is thoughtful and searching, and B. Eugene McCarthy, Thomas Gray: The Progress of a Poet, 1997, is a good general introduction. Suvir Kaul, Thomas Gray and Literary Authority, 1992, explores the ideology of Gray's poems; while Robert Gleckner, Gray Agonistes, 1997, examines their reflection of his personal relationships. From Sensibility to Romanticism, ed. F. W. Hilles and Harold Bloom, 1965, includes studies of the Elegy by Ian Jack, B. H. Bronson, and Frank Brady.

Eliza Haywood

Haywood's novels, novellas, and plays have become available in a number of separate editions and collections in recent years, including Fantomina and Other Works, ed. Alexander Pettit et al., 2004; Selected Fiction and Drama of Eliza Haywood, ed. Paula Backscheider, 1999; and a four-volume edition of The Selected Works of Eliza Haywood, ed. by Pettit et al., 2000, which includes her miscellaneous writings and journalism. A pair of Haywood's novellas are placed alongside works by Behn, Delarivier Manley, Marj' Davys, and others in Popular Fiction By Women, 1660–1730, ed. Backscheider and John Richetti, 1996. An interesting treatment of Haywood's contribution to shaping the generic character of women's writing in the early eighteenth century appears in Ros Ballaster, Seductive Forms, 1992, and a number of critical and biographical essays are assembled in The Passionate Fictions of Eliza Haywood, ed. Kirsten T. Saxton and Rebecca P. Bocchicchio, 2000.

William Hogarth

The standard, comprehensive critical biography is Ronald Paulson, Hogarth, 3 vols., 1991–93. Jenny Uglow, Hogarth: A Life and a World, 1997, is perceptive and lively. Paulson edited Hogarth's Graphic Works, 2 vols., 1970, as well as The Analysis of Beauty, 1998. The paintings are cataloged by R. B. Beckett, Hogarth, 1949, and the drawings by A. P. Oppe, The Drawings of William Hogarth, 1948. Sean Shesgreen edited Engravings by Hogarth, 1973, in a generous and inexpensive format. Hogarth on High Life, 1970, illuminates Marriage A-la-Mode with the famous eighteenth-century commentaries by Georg Christoph Lichtenberg, trans, and ed. Arthur Wensinger with W. B. Coley. Judy Egeron, Hogarth's Marriage-a-la-Mode, 1997, with color plates and commentary, accompanied an exhibition of the series. David Bindman, Hogarth, 1981, is a good brief introduction to the art, and Bindman and Scott Wilcox edited Among the Whores and Thieves, 1997, a collection of essays on Hogarth and The Beggar's Opera.

David Hume

The standard biography is Ernest Campbell Mossner, The Life of David Hume, 2d ed. 1980. The Letters of David Hume were edited by J. Y. T. Greig, 1932. Hume's Essays Moral, Political, and Literary are available complete in the 1986 edition of Eugene F. Miller. The Cambridge Companion to Hume, ed. David Fate Norton, 1993, provides a useful introduction to the wide range of Hume's thought and to the voluminous literature on his works. The best full account of Hume's political thinking remains Duncan Forbes, Hume's Philosophical Politics, 1975. The many studies of Hume of special interest to students of literature include John Richetti, Philosophical Writing, 1983; Jerome Christensen, Practicing Enlightenment, 1987; Adam Potkay, The Fate of Eloquence in the Age of Hume, 1994; and Fred Parker, Scepticism and Literature, 2003.

Anne Irwin

There is no edition of Irwin's poems, and only a smattering of biographical information is in print. Her long poem Castle Howard, 1732, describes her father's estate. "An Epistle to Mr. Pope" was published in the Gentleman's Magazine in 1736. Irwin's response to Pope is briefly considered by Valerie Rumbold, Women's Place in Pope's World, 1989, and by Claudia Thomas, Alexander Pope and His Eighteenth-Century Women Readers, 1994.

Samuel Johnson

Others among Johnson's friends besides Boswell wrote of him: notably, Hester Lynch Thrale Piozzi, whose Anecdotes (1786) were edited, along with William Shaw's Anecdotes, by Arthur Sherbo, 1974; Sir John Hawkins, whose Life

(1787) was edited and abridged by Bertram H. Davis, 1961; and Frances Burney (Mme d'Arblay), from whose diary C. B. Tinker extracted the Johnsonian passages in Dr. Johnson and Fanny Burney, 1911. Pat Rogers, The Samuel Johnson Encyclopedia, 1996, is a handy source of information. James L. Clifford, Young Sam Johnson, 1955, and Dictionary Johnson, 1979, are well-informed studies of the early and middle years that supplement Boswell's rather sketchy account of Johnson's life before their meeting in 1763. There are fine modern biographies by John Wain, 1975, and W. J. Bate, 1977.

The best collected edition of Johnson's Works appeared as long ago as 1825. It is being replaced by an excellent scholarly edition, published by Yale, that has been coming out irregularly since 1958. The poems were edited by D. N. Smith and E. L. McAdam, 2nd ed. rev. by J. D. Fleeman, 1974. G. B. Hill's editions of Johnsonian Miscellanies, 2 vols., 1897, and The Lives of the Poets, 3 vols., 1905, are still worth consulting for their fine notes. Bruce Redford's edition of the Letters, 5 vols., 1992-94, is superb. The Dictionary is available on CD-ROM, ed. Anne McDermott, 1996.

Robert DeMaria, The Life of Samuel Johnson, 1993, and Lawrence Lipking, Samuel Johnson: The Life of an Author, 1998, offer critical overviews of Johnson's literary career. Thomas Woodman, A Preface to Samuel Johnson, 1993, and The Cambridge Companion to Samuel Johnson, ed. Greg Clingham, 1997, are useful guides. Among critical introductions, W. J. Bate, The Achievement of Samuel Johnson, 1955, is inspiring, and Paul Fussell, Samuel Johnson and the Life of Writing, 1971, is lively. Good specialized studies include W. K. Wimsatt, The Prose Style of Samuel Johnson, 1941; Donald J. Greene, The Politics of Samuel Johnson, 2nd ed., 1990; Carey McIntosh, The Choice of Life: Samuel Johnson and the World of Fiction, 1973; Robert Folkenflik, Samuel Johnson, Biographer, 1978; Nicholas Hudson, Samuel Johnson and Eighteenth-Century Thought, 1988; and John Cannon, Samuel Johnson and the Politics of Hanoverian England, 1994. Joseph E. Brown collected The Critical Opinions of Samuel Johnson, 1926. Jean Hagstrum's fine study of Samuel Johnson's Literary Criticism, 1952, has been complemented by Leopold Damrosch, The Uses of Johnson's Criticism, 1976, and G. F. Parker, Johnson's Shakespeare, 1989. David Venturo, Johnson the Poet, 1997, is a worthwhile study. DeMaria, Johnson's Dictionary and the Language of Learning, 1986, looks at the range of ideas gathered by Johnson; another study is Allen Reddick, The Making of Johnson's Dictionary, 1746-1773, rev. 1996. J. L. Clifford and D. J. Greene's survey and bibliography of critical studies, rev. 1970, was updated through 1985 by Greene and J. A. Vance, 1987.

Mary Leapor

The Works of Mary Leapor, 2003, was edited by Richard Greene and Ann Messenger. The only full-length study is Greene, Mary Leapor: A Study in Eighteenth-Century Women's Poetry, 1993. Donna Landry puts Leapor among eighteenth-century laboring-class women poets in The Muses of Resistance, 1990, and Betty Rizzo places her in the contexts of her time in "Molly Leapor: An Anxiety for Influence," in The Age of Johnson 4 (1991). Claudia Thomas (see Irwin) analyzes Leapor's relation to Pope.

John Locke

P. H. Nidditch edited the standard edition of An Essay concerning Human Understanding, 1975. The standard edition of the Two Treatises of Government is by Peter Laslett, 1960; this may be supplemented by Ian Shapiro's 2003 edition, which also offers critical essays. Maurice Cranston, John Locke, 1957, is a good biography. John Yolton, Locke: An Introduction, 1985 and The Cambridge Companion to Locke, ed. Vere Chappell, 1994, survey the range of his thought. John Jenkins, Understanding Locke, 1983, and Ian Harris, The Mind of John Locke, 1994, are strenuous accounts of his ideas. John Dunn, Political Thought of John Locke, 1969, presents a standard account of the topic.

Lady Mary Wortley Montagu

Isobel Grundy's full-scale biography, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu: Comet of the Enlightenment, 1999, adds much information to Robert Halsband's elegant Life of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, 1956. Halsband also edited The Complete Letters, 3 vols., 1965-67; Selected Letters, 1970; and with Grundy, Essays and Poems and Simplicity, a Comedy, 2nd ed., 1993. Grundy edited Romance Writings, 1996.

Sir Isaac Newton

The Norton Critical Edition of Newton, ed. I. Bernard Cohen and Richard Westfall, 1995, includes texts and commentaries that reflect his various interests. Cohen's edition of Papers and Letters on Natural Philosophy, 1978, has a good introduction to Newton's optics by Thomas Kuhn. The Correspondence, 7 vols., was edited by H. W. Turnbull et al., 1959-77. Two fine biographies, Westfall, Never at Rest, 1980, and A. Rupert Hall, Isaac Newton: Adventurer in Thought, 1992, offer an introduction to Newton's ideas as well as his life, as does James Gleick, Isaac Newton, 2003.

Samuel Pepys

The standard edition of The Diary of Samuel Pepys, 11 vols., ed. Robert Latham and William Matthews, 1970-83, includes a companion and index. Latham also edited a good one-volume selection, The Shorter Pepys, 1985. J. R. Tanner's lectures, reprinted as Samuel Pepys and the Royal Navy, 1920, helped call attention to the serious work of Pepys's life. The fullest biography is Arthur Bryant, Samuel Pepys, 3 vols., 1933–38. A good popular biography is Claire Tomalin, Samuel Pepys, 2002. Stuart Sherman analyzes Pepys's use of the diary in Telling Time, 1996.

Alexander Pope

There is no reliable complete edition of Pope's works. Although defective in many respects, the Victorian edition by Whitwell Elwin and J. W. Courthope, 10 vols., 1871–89, must still be consulted (with caution). The excellent Twickenham Edition of the poems, 11 vols., 1939–67, a cooperative undertaking by several scholars (under John Butt), includes valuable introductory and critical materials and notes. A convenient selection in a single volume, with selected notes, omits the translations of Homer. The Prose Works was edited in 2 vols., by Norman Ault, 1936, and Rosemary Cowler, 1986.

Maynard Mack, Alexander Pope: A Life, 1986, is a full and sympathetic biography. George Sherburn, Early Career of Alexander Pope, 1934, and Mack, The Garden and the City, 1969, on Pope's later career, are valuable studies. David Foxon, Pope and the Early Eighteenth-Century Book Trade, 1991, and Brean Hammond, Professional Imaginative Writing in England, 1670–1740, 1997, treat Pope's concern with the business of publication. Howard Erskine-Hill, The Social Milieu of Alexander Pope, 1975, and Valerie Rumbold, Women's Place in Pope's World, 1989, are worthwhile. Sherburn's edition of the Correspondence, 5 vols., 1956, is standard. R. H. Griffith, Alexander Pope: A Bibliography, 2 vols., 1962, is a detailed list of Pope's writings.

David B. Morris, Alexander Pope: The Genius of Sense, 1984, offers fine criticism of individual poems. Reuben A. Brower, Alexander Pope: The Poetry of Allusion, 1959, is an enlightening study of Pope's lifelong habit of adapting phrases, images, and ideas from earlier poets, especially those of classical antiquity. Much information is gathered up in Robert W. Rogers, The Major Satires of Alexander Pope, 1955. Austin Warren, Alexander Pope as Critic and Humanist, 1929, is dated but still useful. Aubrey Williams has analyzed Pope's Dunciad, 1955, and John Sitter, The Poetry of Pope's Dunciad, 1971. Helen Deutsch, Resemblance and Disgrace, 1996, treats Pope as a cultural figure; and Blakey Vermeule, The Party of Humanity, 2000, examines his poetry in the context of the moral psychology of the period. Several essays on Pope are included in Maynard Mack, Collected in Himself, 1982. Mack also edited Essential Articles for the Study of Alexander Pope, 1964, and with James Winn, Pope: Recent Essays, 1980. The Enduring Legacy, ed. G. S. Rousseau and Pat Rogers, 1988, and Critical Essays on Alexander Pope, ed. Wallace Jackson and R. Paul Yoder, 1993, collect new essays on Pope, and Brean Hammond has edited Pope, 1996, a critical reader.

Popular Ballads

The great ballad collection is that of F. J. Child, The English and Scottish Popular Ballads, 1882, more available in the somewhat abridged edition by H. C. Sargent and G. L. Kittredge, 1904. Selections will be found in The Faber Book of Ballads, ed. M. J. C. Hodgart, 1965, and The Oxford Book of Ballads, ed. James Kinsley, 1969. For general discussion, see F. B. Gummere, The Popular Ballads, 1907; G. H. Gerould, The Ballad of Tradition, 1932; W. J. Entwistle, European Balladry, 1939; M. J. C. Hodgart, The Ballads, 1950; and David Buchan, The Ballad and the Folk, 1972.

Matthew Prior

The complete critical edition of Prior is Literary Works, ed. H. B. Wright and M. K. Spears, 2 vols., 1971. The older and less complete edition in two volumes by A. R. Waller, 1905, 1907, is useful. F. M. Rippey, Matthew Prior, 1986, is a good brief survey. The best biography is Charles K. Eves, Matthew Prior, Poet and Diplomatist, 1939.

John Wilmot, Second Earl of Rochester

There are good editions of the complete works, by Frank Ellis, 1994, and Harold Love, 1999, and of the poems, by David Vieth, 1968, and Keith Walker, 1984. Since Vivian de Sola Pinto's biography, Enthusiast in Wit, 1962, new source materials have been added by John Adlard, The Debt to Pleasure, 1974, and Jeremy Treglown's edition of the Letters, 1980. Dustin Griffin, Satires against Man, 1973; David Farley-Hills, Rochester's Poetry, 1978; and Marianne Thormahlen, Rochester: The Poems in Context, 1993, are good critical studies. A collection of Critical Essays, 1988, was edited by Vieth.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury

Lawrence E. Klein edited a handy one-volume edition of Shaftesbury's Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times, 1999. Shaftesbury's other works are available in older editions: The Life, Unpublished Letters, and Philosophical Regimen of Anthony, Earl of Shaftesbury (with a biography written by his son), 1900, and a collection of Shaftesbury's writings about art, Second Characters, 1914, both edited by Benjamin Rand. Klein also wrote an important book on Shaftesbury's cultural influence, Shaftesbury and the Culture of Politeness, 1994. Other oft-cited accounts of Shaftesbury's influence appear in David Marshall, The Figure of Theater, 1985; John Barrell, The Political Theory of Painting from Reynolds to Hazlitt, 1986; Howard Caygill, Art of Judgement, 1989; and Terry Eagleton, The Ideology of the Aesthetic, 1990.

Christopher Smart

The standard edition is Smart's Poetical Works, ed. Karina Williamson and Marcus Walsh, 6 vols., 1980–96. There is a useful one-volume selection by R. E. Brittain, 1950. On the life, Christopher Devlin, Poor Kit Smart, 1961, may be supplemented by Arthur Sherbo, Christopher Smart, Scholar of the University, 1967, and Chris Mounsey, Clcvm of God, 2001. Betty Rizzo and Robert Mahony edited The Annotated Letters of Christopher Smart, 1991. Good critical studies are Moira Dearnley, The Poetry of Christopher Smart, 1968, and Harriet Guest, A Form of Sound Words: The Religious Poetry of Christopher Smart, 1989. Geoffrey Hartman includes interesting essays on Smart and Collins in Beyond Formalism, 1970, and The Fate of Reading, 1975.

Sir Richard Steele

See Joseph Addison and Sir Richard Steele.

Jonathan Swift

Irvin Ehrenpreis's standard, comprehensive biography, Swift: The Man, His Works, and the Age, consists of three volumes: Mr. Swift and His Contemporaries, 1962, Dr. Swift, 1967, and Dean Swift, 1983. Victoria Glendinning, Jonathan Swift, 1998, offers a portrayal of his character. J. A. Downie, Jonathan Swift, Political Writer, 1984, and David Nokes, Jonathan Swift, A Hypocrite Reversed, 1985, are good introductions to the life and writings. Louis A. Landa, Swift and the Church of Ireland, 1954, is a valuable special study.

The standard edition of the poems is by Sir Harold Williams, 2 vols., 1937, rev., 1958. Pat Rogers's edition of Swift's Complete Poems, 1983, is reliable and less expensive. Herbert Davis has edited the prose works in fourteen volumes, 1939–68. Swift's Correspondence was edited by Williams, 5 vols., 1963–65. Other distinguished editions include Davis, The Drapier's Letters, 1935; Williams, Journal to Stella, 2 vols., 1948; A. C. Guthkelch and D. Nichol Smith, A Tale of a Tub, 2nd ed., 1958; and Frank H. Ellis, A Discourse of the Contests and Dissentions between the Nobles and the Commons in Athens and Rome, 1967. For the Norton Critical Editions series, Robert Greenberg and W. B. Piper edited The Writings of Jonathan Swift, 1973, and Albert Rivera edited Gulliver's Travels, 2001.

Among the abundant critical studies, the student should find especially helpful Ricardo Quintana, The Mind and Art of Jonathan Swift, 1936, and Swift: An Introduction, 1955. Arthur Case, Four Essays on Gulliver's Travels, Herbert Davis, Jonathan Swift: Essays on his Satire and Other Studies, 1964; C. J. Rawson, Gulliver and the Gentle Reader, 1973; Robert Phiddian, Swift's Parody, 1995; and Frank Boyle, Swift as Nemesis, 2000, are all useful. Rawson, God, Gulliver, and Genocide, 2001, places Swift's obsessions in the context of world-historical catastrophe. After long neglect, Swift's poems have attracted a wealth of criticism; some of the best were collected by David Vieth, Essential Articles for the study of Jonathan Swift's Poetry, 1984. Three books by Robert C. Elliott, The Power of Satire, 1960, The Shape of Utopia, 1970, and The Literary Persona, 1982, contain interesting chapters on Swift; so do Edward Said, The World, the Text, and the Critic, 1983, and Carol Houlihan Flynn, The Body in Swift and Defoe, 1990. Two good collections of essays are Jonathan Swift: A Critical Anthology, ed. Denis Donoghue, 1971, and The Character of Swift's Satire, ed. C. J. Rawson, 1983.

James Thomson

The standard biography is James Sambrook, James Thomson, 1740-1748: A Life, 1991. A. D. McKillop edited Thomson's Letters and Documents, 1958, which contains much about Thomson's friends and literary circle, and The Castle of Indolence and Other Poems, 1961. There are good notes in Sambrook's edition of The Seasons and The Castle of Indolence, 1972, and Sambrook-edited scholarly texts of The Seasons, 1981, and Liberty, The Castle of Indolence, and Other Poems, 1986. McKillop, The Background of Thomson's Seasons, 1942, is valuable. Ralph Cohen, The Art of Discrimination, 1964, uses responses to The Seasons to illustrate the development of critical theory; and Cohen added a critical study, The Unfolding of the Seasons, 1970. Patricia M. Spacks, The Poetry of Vision, 1966, contains chapters on Thomson, Collins, Gray, Smart, and Cowper. John Barrell, English Literature in History 1730-80, 1983, examines the social implications of Thomson's poems.

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in Sections A, B, and C of this appendix, help us address the internal style, form, and structure of works. Other terms, such as those in Section D, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called "rhetoric," ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call "style" and "structure." Our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word's current usage.

Most of the examples are drawn from texts in this anthology.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Style

In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its "tone." We often can intuit the tone of a text; the following terms offer a set of concepts by which we can analyze the stylistic features that produce the tone. The groups within this section move from the micro to the macro level internal to works.

(i) Diction

"Diction," or "lexis" (from, respectively, Latin "dictio" and Greek "lexis," each meaning "word"), designates the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

Connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term "depression" and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase "the blues."

Denotation: A word has a basic, "prosaic" (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word "steed," for example, might call to mind a horse fitted with battle gear, to be ridden by a warrior, but its denotation is simply "horse."

* This appendix was devised and compiled by James Simpson with the collaboration of all the editors.

Lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (e.g., January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

Register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society (e.g., "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial register is used in less formal or more relaxed social situations (e.g., "the boss"). In classical and medieval rhetoric, these registers of formality were called high style and low style. A middle style was defined as the style fit for narrative, not drawing attention to itself.

(ii) Rhetorical Figures: Figures of Speech

Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called "figures of speech"; in classical rhetoric they were called "schemes" (from Greek "schema," meaning "form, figure").

Alliteration (from Latin "litera," alphabetic letter): the repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words. This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable. Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Sithen the sege and the assaut was sesed at Troye" (see vol. 1, p. 161). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. 2, p. 2377).

Anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): the repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. 2, p. 94); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a/Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. 2, p. 2473).

Assonance (Latin "sounding to"): the repetition of identical or near identical stressed vowel sounds in words whose final consonants differ, producing half-rhyme. Tennyson, "The Lady of Shalott," line 100: "His broad clear brow in sunlight glowed" (see vol. 2, p. 1116).

Chiasmus (Greek "crosswise"): the inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, "Eloisa to Abelard," line 104, "The crime was common, common be the pain" (see vol. 1, p. 2535); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: "They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide" (see vol. 1, p. 2549).

Consonance (Latin "sounding with"): the repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose vowel sounds are different. Herbert, "Easter," line 13: "Consort, both heart and lute . . ." (see vol. 1, p. 1608).

- Homophone (Greek "same sound"): a word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").
- Onomatopoeia (Greek "name making"): verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote. Hopkins, "Binsey Poplars," lines 10—12 (about some felled trees): "O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!" (see vol. 2, p. 1519).
- Rhyme: the repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ ("dead" / "head"). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line ("decays" / "days"). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables ("fountains"/"mountains"). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: "The guests are met, the feast is set" (see vol. 2, p. 430). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones; Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17/18: "seeke" / "seke." Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, "They say that Hope is Happiness," lines 5^-7: "most" / "lost" (see vol. 2, p. 613). Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, "Miners," lines 9—11: "simmer" / "summer" (see vol. 2, p. 1973).

(Hi) Rhetorical Figures: Figures of Thought

Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are "trope" (Greek "twisting," referring to the irregularity of use) and "conceit" (Latin "concept," referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse "trope" with "topos" (a common error).

- Allegory (Greek "saying otherwise"): saying one thing (the "vehicle" of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory's "tenor"). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor ("John is a lion"), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type.
- Antithesis (Greek "placing against"): juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777—80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. 1, p. 1849).
- Bathos (Greek "depth"): a sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157—58: "Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last" (see vol. 1, p. 2524).
- Emblem (Greek "an insertion"): a picture allegorically expressing a moral, or a verbal picture open to such interpretation. Donne, "A Hymn to Christ," lines 1—2: "In what torn ship soever I embark, / That ship shall be my emblem of thy ark" (see vol. 1, p. 1300).
- Euphemism (Greek "sweet saying"): the figure by which something distasteful

- is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (e.g., "he passed away").
- Hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11—12: "My vegetable love would grow/Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. 1, p. 1703); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9—12: "Til love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. 2, p. 2427).
- Irony (Greek "dissimulation"): strictly, a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite; Byron, Don Juan 1.1—2: "I want a hero: an uncommon want, / When every year and month sends forth a new one" (see vol. 2, p. 670). For an extended example of irony, see Swift's "Modest Proposal."
- Litotes (from Greek "smooth"): strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: "differences of no slight import" (see vol. 1, p. 524). More loosely, understatement; Swift, "A Tale of a Tub": "Last week I saw a woman flayed, and you will hardly believe how much it altered her person for the worse" (see vol. 1, p. 2320). Stevie Smith, "Sunt Leones," lines 11—12: "And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do" (see vol. 2, p. 2373).
- Metaphor (Greek "carrying across," etymologically parallel to Latin "translation"): the identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, "London," lines 11—12: "And the hapless Soldier's sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls" (see vol. 2, p. 94).
- Metonymy (Greek "change of name"): using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus "The Press," designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. A figure closely related to synecdoche.
- Occupatio (Latin "taking possession"): denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as "praeteritio" (Latin "passing by"). See Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, lines 414—32 (see vol. 1, p. 308).
- Oxymoron (Greek "sharp blunt"): conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: "darkness visible" (see vol. 1, p. 1833). Ramanujan, "Foundlings in the Yukon," line 41: "these infants compact with age" (see vol. 2, p. 2582).
- Paradox (Greek "contrary to received opinion"): an apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song," line 12: "O sweete harm so quainte" (see vol. 1, p. 316).
- Periphrasis (Greek "declaring around"): circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1-4 (vol. 1, p. 982).
- Personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek "person making"): the attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Shakespeare, King Lear 3.2.1: "Blow winds and crack your cheeks, rage! Blow!" (see vol. 1, p. 1182).
- Pun: a sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. 1, p. 1075).
- Sarcasm (Greek "flesh tearing"): a wounding remark, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children" (see vol. 1, p. 2792).

Simile (Latin "like"): comparison, usually using the word "like" or "as," of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, "The Storm," lines 29—30: "Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail." Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338—46 (see vol. 1, p. 1839).

Symbol (Greek "token"): something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. Blake, "The Sick Rose," lines 1—8: "O Rose, thou art sick. / The invisible worm / That flies in the night / In the howling storm / Has found out thy bed / Of crimson joy, And his dark secret love / Does thy life destroy" (see vol. 2, p. 91). In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it. For discussion, see Coleridge, "On Symbol and Allegory" (vol. 2, p. 488).

Synecdoche (Greek "to take with something else"): using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; "Donne, "A Hymn to Christ," lines 1—2: "In what torn ship soever I embark / That ship shall be my emblem of thy ark" (see vol. 1, p. 1300).

Type (Greek "impression, figure"): In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as "types," or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

Zeugma (Greek "a yoking"): a syntactic pun whereby the one word is revealed to have more than one sense in the sentence as a whole; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7—8, in which the word "take" is used in two senses: "Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea" (see vol. 1, p. 2521).

(iv) Meter, Rhythm

Verse (from Latin "versus," turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin "prorsus," straightforward) as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms. Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (e.g., French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter. In the definitions belmv, "u" designates one unstressed syllable, and "/" one stressed syllable.

Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek "to flow") denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

Accent (synonym "stress"): the special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun "accent," for example, the stress is on the first syllable.

Alexandrine: in French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

Anapest: a three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

Caesura (Latin "cut"): a pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, "Colonization in Reverse," lines 5—8: "By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun" (see vol. 2, p. 2472).

Dactyl (Greek "finger," because of the finger's three joints): a three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed (/) followed by two unstressed (uu) syllables. Thus, for example, "Oregon."

Dimeter (Greek "two measure"): a two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, e.g., "The Tunning of Elinour Rumming" (see vol. 1, p. 516). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, "Discipline," line 3: "O my God" (see vol. 1, p. 1623).

End-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. 2, p. 2430). Compare enjambment.

Enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the metrical pattern, i.e., when the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44—45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. 2, p. 2430).

Hexameter (Greek "six measure"): The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. 1, p. 720), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. 2, p. 2025).

Hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

Iamb: the basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed (u) followed by stressed (!) and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, "Vermont."

Monometer (Greek "one measure"): an entire line with just one stress; Sir

Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, "wyth (u) wynne (/)" (see vol. 1, p. 162).

Pentameter (Greek "five measure"): in English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: "O Prince, O Chief of many throned Powers" (see vol. 1, p. 1835).

Spondee: a two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed (/) syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

Syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

Tetrameter (Greek "four measure"): a line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: "She stole along, she nothing spoke" (see vol. 2, p. 450).

Trimeter (Greek "three measure"): a line with three stresses. Herbert, "Discipline," line 1: "Throw away thy rod" (see vol. 1, p. 1623).

Trochee: a two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed (/) followed by unstressed (u) syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, "Texas."

(vi) Verse Forms

The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas (Italian "rooms"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms, a list of which follows.

Ballad stanza: usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See "Sir Patrick Spens" (vol. 1, p. 2902); Louise Bennett's poems (vol. 2, pp. 2469—74); Eliot, "Sweeney among the Nightingales" (vol. 2, p. 2293); Larkin, "This Be The Verse" (vol. 2, p. 2572).

Ballade: a form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, "send off"). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, "Complaint to His Purse" (see vol. 1, p. 318).

Blank verse: unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil's Aeneid (see vol. 1, p. 614), this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare's plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

- Couplet: in English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek "two lines") is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5—6: "Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me" (see vol. 1, p. 1315).
- Ottava rima: an eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, "Sailing to Byzantium" (see vol. 2, p. 2040). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (e.g., Christ's speech from the Cross in Lydgate's Testament, lines 754—897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. 2, p. 669).
- Quatrain: a stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. 1, p. 1644).
- Refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses. See, for example, Wyatt, "Blame not my lute" (vol. 1, p. 602).
- Rhyme royal: a stanza form of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer and called "royal" because the form was used by James I of Scotland for his Kingis Quair in the early fifteenth century. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song" (see vol. 1, p. 316).
- Sonnet: a form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or "volta," often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, "Whoso list to hunt" (vol. 1, p. 595); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. 1, p. 975); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. 1, p. 1060); Wordsworth, "London, 1802" (vol. 2, p. 319); McKay, "If We Must Die" (vol. 2, p. 2464); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. 2, p. 2833).
- Spenserian stanza: the stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. 2, p. 822), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. 2, p. 888).
- Tercet: a stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.
- Terza rima: a sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. First used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, "Mine own John Poins" (vol. 1, p. 604); Shelley, "Ode to the West Wind" (vol. 2, p. 772); and Morris, "The Death of Guinevere" (vol. 2, p. 1483). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78—149 (though unrhymed) of "Little Gidding" (vol. 2, pp. 2315—16); Heaney, "Station Island" (vol. 2, p. 2831); Walcott, Omeros (vol. 2, p. 2591).

Triplet: a tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315-17 (vol. 1, p. 2504).

Villanelle: a fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" (see vol. 2, p. 2450).

(v) Syntax

Syntax (Greek "ordering with") designates the rides by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech. The list below offers some useful terms for the description of syntactic features of a work.

Apposition: the repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. 1, p. 24), where the phrases "heaven kingdom's guardian," "the Measurer's might," "his mind-plans," and "the work of the Glory-Father" each serve an identical syntactic function as the direct objects of "praise."

Hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): the rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. 1, p. 2867). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. 1, p. 218) and of Paradise Lost (vol. 1, p. 1832).

Hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): the subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513—15: "As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river's mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he" (vol. 1, p. 1984). The contrary principle to parataxis.

Parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering beside"):

the coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, "Morte Darthur": "So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy" (see vol. 1, p. 442). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

(vii) Point of View

All of the many kinds of writing (see "B. Genre and Mode," below) involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be poiverfid and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator's position. In other genres, the narrator's position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, hut it also informs the structure of that work. Most of the terms below are especially relevant to narrative in either verse or prose, but many also apply to other modes of writing.

Deixis (Greek "pointing"): Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a "here" and a "now" from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as "here," "there," "this," "that," "now," "then") are examples of deixis, or "deictics." This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

First-person narration: a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun ("I," "me," "my," etc., or possibly "we," "us," "our"), and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

Frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

Free indirect style: a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, "A Sketch of the Past," where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child's manner of perception: "—I begin: the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress" (see vol. 2, p. 2155).

Omniscient narrator (Latin "all-knowing narrator"): a narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, "On the Western Circuit" (see vol. 2, p. 1852).

Order: A story' may be told in different orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin "in the middle of the matter"). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, "A Letter of the Authors" (vol. 1, p. 716). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French "story") for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here "narration") for the narrative as presented.

Plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated.

Stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Lestrygonians" (see vol. 2, p. 2213).

Third-person narration: a narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to explicitly or implicitly by third-person pronouns ("he," "she," etc.), without the limitation of a first-person narration. Thus Johnson, The History of Rasselas.

Unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle's Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. 1, p. 2756).

B. Genre and Mode

The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. All the other terms in this list refer to more or less specific literary genres. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (e.g., the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every statement!

Animal fable: a short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Fox" (see vol. 1, p. 457).

Aubade (originally from Spanish "alba," dawn): a lover's dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, "The Sun Rising" (see vol. 1, p. 1266). Larkin recasts the genre in "Aubade" (see vol. 2, p. 2573).

Autobiography (Greek "self-life writing"): a narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. 2, p. 322). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author's path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Runyan's Grace Abounding.

Beast epic: a continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the

- Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun's Priest's Tale (see vol. 1, p. 298).
- Biography (Greek "life-writing"): a life as the subject of an extended narrative. Thus Izaak Walton, The Life of Dr. Donne (see vol. 1, p. 1309).
- Comedy: a term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (see vol. 1, p. 1079).
- Comic mode: many genres (e.g., romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.
- Dialogue (Greek "conversation"): Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato's Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.
- Didactic mode (Greek "teaching mode"): genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (e.g., sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (e.g., animal fable, parable).
- Discourse (Latin "running to and fro"): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme. Thus Newman, The Idea of a University (see vol. 2, p. 1035).
- Dramatic monologue (Greek "single speaking"): a poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, "Ulysses" (vol. 2, p. 1123); Browning, "The Bishop Orders His Tomb" (vol. 2, p. 1259); Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (vol. 2, p. 2289); Carol Ann Duffy, "Medusa" and "Mrs Lazarus" (vol. 2, pp. 2875-76).
- Elegy: In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (e.g., Ovid's Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne ("On His Mistress" [see vol. 1, p. 1281]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. 2, p. 1138); Yeats, "In Memory of Major Robert Gregory" (vol. 2, p. 2034); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. 2, p. 2429); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. 2, p. 2833).
- Epic (synonym, heroic poetry): an extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. 1, p. 1829); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. 2, p. 322); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. 2, p. 2591). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. 1, p. 2513).
- Epigram: a short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. 1, p. 1427).

- Epigraph (Greek "inscription"): any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book's title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work's themes in the most compressed form possible.
- Epistle (Latin "letter"): the letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals. The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, "Mine own John Poins" (see vol. 1, p. 604), or Pope, "Epistle to a Lady" (vol. 1, p. 2598). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (e.g., Samuel Richardson's Pamela).
- Epitaph: a pithy formulation to be inscribed on a funeral monument. Thus Raleigh, "The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself" (see vol. 1, p. 923).
- Epithalamion (Greek "concerning the bridal chamber"): a wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. 1, p. 907).
- Essay (French "trial, attempt"): an informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. 1, p. 2470); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. 1, p. 2496).
- Fabliau (French "little story," plural fabliaux): a short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller's Prologue and Tale (vol. 1, p. 239).
- Farce: a play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve's The Way of the World (see vol. 1, p. 2228) draws on this tradition.
- Georgic (Greek "farming"): Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor. For an English poem that critiques both genres, see Crabbe, "The Village" (vol. 1, p. 2887).
- Heroic poetry: see epic.
- Homily (Greek "discourse"): a sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. 1, p. 635). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. 1, p. 284).
- Journal (French "daily"): a diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. 1, p. 2134).
- Lai: a short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. 1, p. 141).
- Legend (Latin "requiring to be read"): a narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the "Arthurian legend" but the "myth of Proserpine."
- Lullaby: a bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, "Lullaby" (see vol. 2, p. 2423).
- Lyric (from Greek "lyre"): Initially meaning a song, "lyric" refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus "The Wife's Lament" (see vol. 1, p. 113); Yeats, "The Wild Swans at Coole" (see vol. 2, p. 2033).

Masque: costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated. See Jonson, The Masque of Blackness (see vol. 1, p. 1327).

Myth: the narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the "Arthurian legend" but the "myth of Proserpine."

Novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel's openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Bronte sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

Novella: a short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. 2, p. 1890).

Ode (Greek "song"): a lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (vol. 2, p. 306); and Marvell, "An Horatian Ode" (vol. 1, p. 1712), or Keats, "Ode on Melancholy" (vol. 2, p. 906). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson's "Ode on Cary and Morison" (vol. 1, p. 1439).

Panegyric: Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek "showing"), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek "sweet speaking"), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

Parable: a simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

Pastoral (from Latin "pastor," shepherd): Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil's Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for "herdsman"). Thus Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar (see vol. 1, p. 708).

- Romance: From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; (ii) high-style diction; (iii) aristocratic social milieu. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. 1, p. 160); Spenser's (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. 1, p. 713). The immensely popular, fertile genre was absorbed, in both domesticated and undomesticated form, by the novel. For an adaptation of romance, see Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale (vol. 1, p. 256).
- Satire: In Roman literature (e.g., Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. 1, p. 2548). Wyatt's "Mine own John Poins" (see vol. 1, p. 604) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.
- Satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift's travel narrative Gulliver's Travels (see vol. 1, p. 2323), his essay "A Modest Proposal" (vol. 1, p. 2462), Pope's mock-epic The Dunciad (vol. 1, p. 2559), and Gay's Beggars' Opera (vol. 1, p. 2613), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.
- Short story: generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, "The Daughters of the Late Colonel" (see vol. 2, p. 2333).
- Topographical poem (Greek "place writing"): a poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places. Thus Gray, "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College" (see vol. 1, p. 2863).
- Tragedy: a dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieu. The opposite of comedy. Shakespeare, King Lear (see vol. 1, p. 1139).
- Tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.
- Tragicomedy: a play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

C. Miscellaneous

- Act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.
- Aesthetics (from Greek, "to feel, apprehend by the senses"): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract.

Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

- Allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.
- Anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonists' recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.
- Apostrophe (from Greek "turning away"): an address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.
- Blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved's face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167—84 (see vol. 1, p. 907). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. 1, p. 1074).
- Burlesque (French and Italian "mocking"): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope's Rape of the Lock (see vol. 1, p. 2513) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.
- Canon (Greek "rule"): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.
- Catastrophe (Greek "overturning"): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.
- Catharsis (Greek "cleansing"): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.
- Character (Greek "stamp, impression"): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the "fuller," or more "rounded," a character is said to be. A "stock" character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.
- Classical, Classicism, Classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, "classical" primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. "Classicism" denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. "Classic" denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.
- Climax (Greek "ladder"): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: "Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement" (see vol. 1, p. 1561).
- Convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

- Decorum (Latin "that which is fitting"): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.
- Denouement (French "unknotting"): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.
- Dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.
- Ecphrasis (Greek "speaking out"): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, "Musee des Beaux Arts" (see vol. 2, p. 2428).
- Exegesis (Greek "leading out"): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.
- Exemplum (Latin "example"): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (e.g., sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis. Thus Johnson's example of "Sober" in his essay "On Idleness" (see vol. 1, p. 2678).
- Hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.
- Imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (e.g., the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (e.g., Romanticism).
- Parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. 1, p. 1074).
- Pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146—47: "With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears" (see vol. 1, p. 1810). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), "Of the Pathetic Fallacy" (vol. 2, p. 1322).
- Peripeteia (Greek "turning about"): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.
- Persona (Latin "sound through"): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor's voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, by whose voice the author may mask him- or herself. Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (see vol. 2, p. 2289).
- Protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.
- Rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

Scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

Sensibility (from Latin, "capable of being perceived by the senses"): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of "sensibility," such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe's Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper's passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. 1, p. 2893).

Soliloquy (Latin "single speaking"): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts. Thus Viola's soliloquy in Shakespeare, Twelfth Night 2.2.17-41 (vol. 1, p. 1095).

Sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

Taste (from Italian "touch"): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

Topos (Greek "place," plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer's spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. 1, p. 218).

Tradition (from Latin "passing on"): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer's culture. "Tradition" is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (e.g., the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

Translation (Latin "carrying across"): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

Vernacular (from Latin "verna," servant): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the "vernacular" languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

Wit: Originally a synonym for "reason" in Old and Middle English, "wit" became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope's definition of true wit as "Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed"

(Essay on Criticism, lines 297—98; see vol. I, p. 2503). See also Johnson, Lives of the Poets, "Cowley," on "metaphysical wit" (see vol. 1, p. 2766). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

D. Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology's introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

Bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul's Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers' Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

Censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard "heresy." After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers' Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author's execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

Codex (Latin "book"): having the format of a book (usually applied to manuscript books), as distinguished originally from the scroll, which was the standard form of written document in ancient Rome.

Copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work's publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

Copy text: the particular text of a work used by a textual editor as the basis of an edition of that work.

Folio: Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

Foul papers: versions of a work before an author has produced, if she or he has, a final copy (a "fair copy") with all corrections removed.

Manuscript (Latin, "written by hand"): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (e.g., animal skins); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

Paleography (Greek "ancient writing"): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

Patronage (Latin "protector"): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (e.g., Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

Periodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French "jour," day), periodical writing appears at larger, but still frequent, intervals, characteristically in the form of the essay. Periodicals were developed especially in the eighteenth century.

Printing: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

Publisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers' Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

Royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

Scribe: in manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640—60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

Subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

Textual criticism: works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, or Eire, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as "Britain" or "Great Britain" and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, "England." For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century c.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are collectively known as the Anglo-Saxons, and the word England is related to the first element of their name. By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Anglo-Saxons and subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island's other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the brief period of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union welded them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800-1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for "white"), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly white settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century.

The white dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and "the Old Commonwealth" at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of imported slaves, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the white minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago won independence in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions with nations emerging out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Pakistan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with 30 percent of the world's population.

Britisk Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other well-known, obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing ('A penny).

In recent years, the British government and people have been contemplating and debating a change even greater than the shift to the decimal system. Britain, a member of the European Union, may adopt the EU's common currency, the Euro, and eventually see the pound itself become obsolete. More than many other EU-member countries, Britain has resisted this change: many people strongly identify their country with its rich commercial history and tend to view their currency patriotically as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. At the beginning of the twentieth century, 1 pound was worth about 5 American dollars, though those bought three to four times what they now do. Now, the pound buys anywhere from $1.50 to $1.90. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. In Anglo-Saxon times, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages rose sharply, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The chart below provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart below, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius), a sum would normally be written £2.19.3, i.e., 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom's budget for the day depicted in Joyce's novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. In general, authority passes from father to eldest surviving son, from daughters in order of seniority if there is no son, to a brother if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, i.e., hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may father kings, but is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about £1000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as "Your Majesty," princes and princesses as "Your Highness," the other hereditary nobility as "My Lord" or "Your Lordship." Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred Lord Tennyson, created first Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father's title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward's marriage in 1999, the queen created him earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since the Anglo-Saxon period, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

The king and queen	(These are all of the royal line.)

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92 temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the "Law Lords").

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is "knight." Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as "Sir John"; his wife, using the last name, is "Lady Black"—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be "Lady Arabella." The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of "Dame." Though the word itself comes from the Anglo-Saxon cnicht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as "gongs") are granted by the monarch in her New Year's and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including rock stars and actors. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

Religions in England

In the sixth century C.E., missionaries from Ireland and the Continent introduced Christianity to the Anglo-Saxons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in the Norton Anthology were composed, therefore, the English people had been Christians for hundreds of years; such Anglo-Saxon poems as "The Dream of the Bood" bear witness to their faith. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of paganism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. In English literature such "folkloric" elements often elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer's Wife of Bath looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was "fulfilled of fairye." Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as "Corinna's Gone A-Maying" and "The Hock Cart."

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform across Western Europe—hence called "catholic," or universally shared—and its rituals and expectations, common to the whole community, permeated everyday life. The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. In its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it resembled the feudal state, but the church power structure coexisted alongside a separate hierarchy of lay authorities with a theoretically different sphere of social responsibilities. The sharing out of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer's pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such struggle: Thomas a Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry III, was assassinated on the king's orders in 1120 and later made a saint. As an international organization, the church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin, and thus although statistically in the period the largest segment of literate persons were monks and priests, the clerical contribution to great writing in English was relatively modest. Yet the lay writers of the period reflect the importance of the church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in everyday life.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the Pope, setting in train the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out with impunity and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the Pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the Pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the "Glorious Revolution" in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in northern Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still playing out today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Betreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. S. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. In the past fifty years, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Although 71 percent of the population still identified itself as "Christian" on the 2000 census, only about 7 percent of these regularly attend religious services of any denomination. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies has swelled the ranks of religions once alien to the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

THE UNIVERSE ACCORDING TO PTOLEMY

Ptolemy was a Roman astronomer of Greek descent, born in Egypt during the second century C.E.; for nearly fifteen hundred years after his death his account of the design of the universe was accepted as standard. During that time, the basic pattern underwent many detailed modifications and was fitted out with many astrological and pseudoscientific trappings. But in essence Ptolemy's followers portrayed the earth as the center of the universe, with the sun, planets, and fixed stars set in transparent spheres orbiting around it. In this scheme of things, as modified for Christian usage, Hell was usually placed under the earth's surface at the center of the cosmic globe, while Heaven, the abode of the blessed spirits, was in the outermost, uppermost circle, the empyrean. But in 1543 the Polish astronomer Copernicus proposed an alternative hypothesis—that the earth rotates around the sun, not vice versa; and despite theological opposition, observations with the new telescope and careful mathematical calculations insured ultimate acceptance of the new view.

The map of the Ptolemaic universe below is a simplified version of a diagram in Peter Apian's Cosmography (1584). In such a diagram, the Firmament is the sphere that contained the fixed stars; the Crystalline Sphere, which contained no heavenly bodies, is a late innovation, included to explain certain anomalies in the observed movement of the heavenly bodies; and the Prime Mover is the sphere that, itself put into motion by God, imparts rotation around the earth to all the other spheres.

Milton, writing in the mid-seventeenth century, used two universes. The Copernican universe, though he alludes to it, was too large, formless, and unfamiliar to be the setting for the war between Heaven and Hell in Paradise Lost. He therefore used the Ptolemaic cosmos, but placed Heaven well outside this smaller earth-centered universe, Hell far beneath it, and assigned the vast middle space to Chaos.
